Twenty-two years ago says the Cleveland Leader, a Confederate flag floated in the warm breeze of a southern clime, over the Marshall House, in Alexandria, Va., Virginia had seceded on the preceding day. Alexandria, which had been filled with insurgents, had, on the morning of this, the 24th of May, been placed under the white flag of truce under an agreement with the commander of the gunboat Pawnee, that it should surrender at 9 o clock in the evening, but still that rebel banner floated over the Marshall House, an insult to every loyal citizen. Colonel Ephraim Elmer Ellsworth, of the New York Zouaves, as brave a man and as noble a soldier as ever lived, tore down that confederate flag twenty-two years ago to-day, and a few months later the first union blood that had dyed southern soil was shed, Colonel Ellsworth paying with his life for that one act of loyalty. Jackson, the proprietor of the Marshall House, shot the noble Ellsworth down without one moment's warning. But Jackson met a death as sudden, his miserable body one moment later being pinned to the floor by the bayonet of Captain Frank E. Brownell, who avenged the death of his young commander before the blood was yet cold in his veins. Captain Brownell was in the city during the past week, and, at the request of a Leader reporter, gave a graphic account of the tragedy in which he played so prominent a part, which cannot but be read with interest by everyone on this the anniversary of the death of the first Union soldier killed on rebel soil.

"It was at midnight on May 23, 1861, that we received our orders to go to Alexandria," said Captain Brownell. "Our company, the New York Fire Zouaves, had been raised by Colonel Ellsworth from the fire department of New York in less than two days after President Lincoln had issued his call for 75,000 men, and four days after Fort Sumter had capitulated and the Nation was throbbing in the first throes of revolution. The regiment had left New York for Washington on April 29, after overcoming much opposition from the civil authorities, who claimed that Colonel Ellsworth's regiment contained more men than the State law allowed. I had just come down from Troy, and joined Colonel Ellsworth's zouaves out of my confidence in the commander and admiration of his character. Colonel Ellsworth's Fire Zouaves attracted much attention on their arrival at Washington. They were the first volunteers on the ground. A good many militia organizations were already at the Capital, but Ellsworth's command was the first volunteer regiment in the field which had had no previous organization. Ellsworth's command was quartered in the House of Representatives. There were some pretty hard characters among his men, but no worse than among other regiments raised at the time.

Some acts of lawlessness raised a storm of indignation in the city and created a prejudice against the whole regiment. Ellsworth ascertained the amount of damage that had been done and paid it out of his own pocket, but the feeling against the regiment was so strong that it was decided to move it out of the city. This was not done, however, until the Zouaves had recovered their prestige by their gallant servi.e at the big fire at Willard's Hotel.

"When it was whispered about headquarters that a movement was to be made on Alexandria, Colonel Ellsworth, between whom and President Lincoln a warm friendship and existed for over a year, Ellsworth having been in Lincoln's law office and on the stump for him in that year, and having been one of the party that started with the President-elect for Washington—Colonel Ellsworth, I say, went to President Lincoln disloyal, and he wanted nothing to occur that might incense them against the government, but rather wished to so conduct the movement that it would win them over. The insurgents must be driven out of Alexandria or taken without bloodshed if possible. The position of President Lincoln was fully understood and appreciated by Colonel Ellsworth. He promised to be responsible for his men if they were allowed the advance. This conference was of course unknown to the command. At 12 o'clock on that night, May 23, 1861, the men were ordered into line and Colonel Ellsworth made a short address to them, which he closed with the words, 'When we reach the place of destination act like men, and do nothing to bring shame upon the regiment. Show the enemy that you are men as well as soldiers and that you will treat them with kindness until they force you to use violence. I want to kill them with kindness and no matter what may happen not a shot must be fired without proper orders'" Before retiring that night Colonel Ellsworth wrote the following touching letter to his father and mother.

A LETTER TO HIS PARENTS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1865.

"My dear parents: The regiment is ordered to move across the river to-night. "We have no means of knowing what reception we will meet with, although I am of the opinion that our entrance to the city of Alexandria will be hotly contested, as I am just informed that a large body of troops arrived here to-day. Should this happen, my dear parents, it may be my lot to be injured in some manner. Whatever may happen cherish the consolation of knowing I was engaged in a sacred duty, and to-night, thinking of the possibility of to-morrow and the occurrences of the past, I am perfectly contented to accept whatever my fortune may be, confident that He who notes the fall of a sparrow will have some purpose even in the fate of one like me.

"My darling and ever loving parents, good bye! God bless, protect, and care for you!—ELMER.

"At two o'clock in the morning of May 24 the boat containing the Ellsworth Fire Zouaves quietly dropped down the river. When we arrived off Alexandria a small boat shot out from the shadow of the gunboat Pawnee, and landed at the wharf simultaneously with us. This boat contained an officer bearing a white flag, and a hurried consultation was held between this officer and Colonel Ellsworth. I have always understood that the colonel was informed that the town had either surrendered or had been placed under the flag of truce or that the people had been given time to leave the city. We were the only Union troops there at that time. We landed at the foot of Cameron street, and the regiment was formed on the wharf. Colonel Ellsworth, in company with the chaplain of the regiment, Mr. Lodge; the correspondent of the New York Times, Mr. Windsor, and Mr. E. H. House, correspondent of the New York Tribune started up Cameron street to go to the telegraph office. At the suggestion of an officer they were accompanied by a guard of five men. I was one of the party. It was broad daylight—after five o'clock—and not a soul in the town seemed to be stirring. We went up Cameron street two squares and turned to the left, down Royal street to King. As we turned the corner of King and Royal streets we came in full view of the Marshall House, on which a confederate flag was fluttering in the breeze. At sight of the rebel flag Ellsworth halted us. Turning to the sergeant he said: Marshal go back and tell Capt. Coyle, of company A. to hurry his company up here as soon as possible.' Then we all passed up the street for a short distance, Col. Ellsworth and the newspaper men a little distance in advance. I suppose he was going to leave Capt. Coyle to take care of the flag when he came up with his company. If that was his intention he changed his mind, for he suddenly turned and went diagonally across the street to the Marshall House.

"I have no doubt he remembered the promise he had made to the President and desired to before the soldiers came up. You can readily imagine the effect the sight of that flag would have had upon his company. The men would have been so inflamed that Capt. Coyle would be unable to control them. Colonel Ellsworth intended to quietly remove the flag, and prevent any violence that it might have caused. He had promised to be responsible for his men. He intended to keep that promise, and to carry out President Lincoln's wish that there be no violence. No one was on the street. No one was stirring about the hotel. Col. Ellsworth went into the hotel, and we followed him. There was but one person visible—the first man we had yet met—and he stood behind the counter in the office. Ellsworth asked him for the proprietor. He replied in a surly manner that he was not about. The whole party then went into the hall and started up the stairway to the attic. Nobody offered to stop us, and nobody was to be seen to do so. When we reached the attic Ellsworth mounted a step-ladder leading to the roof, where the flag halyards came through the scuttle, and pulled in the offending bunting and threw it down the the ladder. We started down the stairs, which were old-fashioned wooden zigzag ones, broken with landings between each story. I was in advance.

"Up to this time everything had been so quiet, peaceful, and dead that none of us dreemed of violence. As I made the turn of the landing in the middle of the flight leading to the third floor, I saw a man standing on the floor below at the side of the stairs with the barrel of a double-barreled gun resting on the bannister. He was a brawny looking fellow and was in his shirt sleeves. I saw as quick as a flash what that gun and that man meant. I was in his eye.

"By the instinct of self-preservation rather than anything else, I jumped to the foot of the stairs at a bound. As I alighted beside him I struck down his gun with my own. Both pieces struck the bannister together and both glanced downward until they slipped off the end of the bannister, where the guns separated. By this time Ellsworth had appeared in sight at the landing I had but just left. Without a word, and before I could recover my equilibrium, the man, who was Jackson, the proprietor of the house.

RAISED HIS GUN AND FIRED.

The muzzle of his shotgun was not more than three or four feet distant.

"Colonel Ellsworth, with the single exclamation 'My God!' pressed his hand on his breast, and fell dead at the foot of the stairway. The heavy charge of buckshot had pierced him just above the heart.

"In the meantime I had jumped back, and just as Jackson raised his gun again, I fired upon him, hitting him in the left eye. Without stopping to see the effect of my shot, I sprang toward him, and with a quick thrust of the bayonet forced him to the floor. It was all done so quickly I had no time to think. As Jackson fell, it was with one convulsive grip upon the trigger, and his other barrel was discharged so close to my head that it seemed to paralyze me. The charge went into the wall just above my head. As the body of the dead rebel slipped from my bayonet it rolled to the floor below. Jackson had never spoken a word from the first and died without a sign. The story that his body was mutilated after his death is false. By this time the entire party had reached the scene. Great excitement ensued. People came rushing from the rooms and the street. I reloaded my gun and the squad stood on the landing for a minute back to back expecting an attack. We compelled them to stand up in a row, that we might command the situation. Mr. House, at the imminent risk of his life went out for assistance. In a few moments Colonel Wilcox, o Michigan, (since a general) came up stairs with Captain Coyle and the regimental surgeon. The body of our dead colonel was wrapped in a blanket and I accompanied it to the navy yard, where it was placed in the engine room for the purpose of embalming. When President Lincoln saw the body he was very much agitated. Lifting the cloth from the face of the dead man he exclaimed with a depth of pathos I shall never forget 'My boy! My boy! Was it necessary this sacrifice should be made?' He made me relate the whole occurrence to him in detail. The body of Ellsworth was taken to the White House at Mr. Lincoln's request, where funeral services were performed. It was then conveyed to New York and funeral services repeated at the Astor House. When it was taken away the entire fire department escorted it to the steamer, by which it went to Albany. There it lay in state at the capitol. Thence it went to Troy, where another funeral was held, at which the whole city turned out. It was finally interred at Mechanicsville, N. Y., the home of his parents."

"Capt. Brownell, will you tell me why it was that a larger guard was not taken along into the city of Alexandria?" asked the reporter.

"Because the city was under a flag of truce, and no danger was apprehended by any one."

"You think Colonel Ellsworth's wish to preserve order and prevent his men from becoming excited and committing acts of violence, when they came up, was his motive for getting the flag out of sight, do you?"

"I most certainly do. He has been criticized for this act by people who know nothing about the circumstances, but when one fully understands his situation at that time it can readily be seen that his motives and movements were inspired by his promise to the president, and that his action was wholly in the interest of the preservation of order. His reputation and that of his company depended upon the conduct of his company that day."

"How did Jackson happen to have his flag flying when the city was under an armistice?"

"I have since learned that Jackson, with his companions, had got drunk the night before to celebrate the secession of Virginia, and that he had not learned that the city was under a flag of truce when he saw us, having been sleeping off the effects of the liquor he had imbibed. He was the man who said that if he could get hold of John Brown he would cut off his ears."

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

How the Great Preacher Looks—What Does he do With His Money.

New York Letter in Hartford Times.

One of the sights that intelligent people want to see, when they come to New York, is Henry Ward Beecher. Take him all in all; Mr. Beecher is probably as remarkable and interesting a person as there is to-day in America. No pulpit preacher, certainly, has a steadier or more copious supply of original and striking ideas; no other one is half so receptive—half so, what shall I say, intuitive? He perceives realities, ahead of his generation, by a kind of clairvoyant prevision, or sympathetic influx. Say what his enemies may about him now, Mr. Beecher's name will be more prominent fifty years hence, among the men of his time, than that of any other preacher, or of any one of those who now, in some of the newspapers, violently censure him. He is a man of broader views, he sees the march of coming events more clearly, than his contemporaries in the theological field—or any other field, for that matter. It is a pleasure to hear, or read, his sermons in Plymouth church. That immense building is regularly crowded, by an eager and deeply attentive audience, whenever he is to talk.

I have said many visitors to New York want to see Mr. Beecher. But Mr. Beecher is not like Seward's statue of the city hall, to be seen at any and all times, by anybody and everybody who cared to look at him. He lives in Brooklyn—where, also, he preaches—and he isn't over here every day, even now since he can come on the big bridge. I saw him a few days ago; he has grown older, of course, than he was in the days of the Tilton scandal, and his somewhat gray and very decidedly thinned locks hang loosely and half curling over his coat collar, showing the work of time. But he still wears, tipped back on his head, that soft old slouch hat (he could not wear any other; he would look ridiculous in a "beaver," an upright, angular "stovepipe of the fashion; he would feel restrained of his freedom, and altogether ill at ease in it) —and under the comfortable brim, so carelessly turned up, or knocked in ifferently backward, that bold, ruddy, sturdy face looks good-naturedly out, with that honest scrutinizing glance for which those bold, intelligent eyes seem so well adapted. How curiously, by the way, those eyes of his are placed. It is the very opposite the oblique line of John Chinaman; the outward corners go down—not up. And there is a world of brimming fun and humor in the expression. It is the look of a man who is entirely at ease (one would say) with himself and the world—the future world included—and feeling altogether comfortable. This man's stomach is evidently a good one; it would grind up a tenpenny nail—it can't digest the Westminster Catechism. Beecher enjoys his dinner. There is withal a certain beefy heaviness and coarseness in that rather fat red face that bespeaks a strong animal nature as well as a keen mental (shall I say spiritual?) faculty. Altogether he is a remarkable man. His sermons will bear reading—and will be read, too—a generation hence. Can as much be said of the sermons of other preachers hereabouts?

One thing puzzles me. What does Mr. Beecher do with his money? Does he save it? He ought to be getting rich. His salary at Plymouth church is $20,000. In addition he must receive at least $5,000 from his lectures. Then he is said to own a newspaper interest in the Christian Union, which must bring him in something, and he owns copyrights which yield him something more—to say nothing of all the marriage fees and presents he receives. Altogether he must be getting nearly $30,000 a year. He is known to be careless in financial matters. He buys things he does not need—he gives away a considerable amount in charity—(and he is bored to death by all sorts of fools and humbugs asking for help)—and he lives fairly well. But he is said to have no money on hand. His wife is a prudent, saving woman; a good housekeeper, it is said; and it is understood she has the purse-strings at times. A case that has happened not long ago will illustrate Beecher's readiness to make purchases. It was at a shop where there was a big book of plates picturing Egyptian scenes and objects of interest. The great preacher took a passing interest in it. "How much is it?" "The price is $250." A pause. "That is a large price. Well," drawing a full breath, "it is only one more lecture; I'll take it!" He didn't need it, more than a dog wants two tails.

Small Farms as a Conservative Power.

The policy of New England from the start has been in favor of small farms. Some other States tolerated baronial grants, which, allowed the land to be absorbed by great proprietors, but the result was disastrous. Our older leaders recollect the fierce contests between the Anti-Renters of New York and the patrons. An amendment of the State Constitution had to be made so as to necessitate the division of overgrown estates before a deadly feud, which menaced the peace of the State, could be healed. Well did Wendell Philips say: "Capital shrieked 'Pillage and agrarianism,' but none the less did the Empire State accept a Barn-burner Constitution." And our national Legislature, by homestead laws, has sought to multiply the class of landholders. It has been felt that the more there are who have a direct interest in the tilling of the soil, the larger the class of those who give a hostage to order.

At times we have felt a fear of the mischievous results of the purchase of large sections of land by capitalists for wheat raising. A class of Bonanza farmers are seeking large returns from the Virgin soil of our younger states and territories. They are not anxious about gathering a class of actual settlers on their broad acres, but desire only laborers. Sowing and reaping require only a few weeks of actual labor, and if they can secure workers enough to manage their ploughs, harrows, reapers, and binders, it is enough. To provide families with homes is no part of their policy. They can be barons, their laborers serfs or Ishmaelties. This course may purchase large profits to the landholder however, but it fails to supply intelligent citizens for the state. Happily it cannot be a permanent system. Even if occasional droughts or other drawbacks endangered not the profits, the soil would soon become exhausted. It demands diversified agriculture, a rotation and variety of crops, to exempt a land from ultimate sterility. To manage successfully, smaller quantities of land must be held by individuals and wisely tilled.—Providence, (R. I.) Free Press.

ADVENTURES OF A BAD BOY.

He Resolves to Lead a Different Life, But His Chum Doesn't.

From the Milwaukee Sun.

"Say, I thought you was going to try to lead a different life," said the grocery man to the bad boy, as the youth came in with his pockets full of angle worms, and wanted to borrow a baking powder can to put them into while he went fishing, and he held a long angle worm up by the tail and let it wiggle so it frightened a girl that had come in after two cents' worth of yeast, so she dropped her pitcher and went out of the grocery as though she was chased by an anaconda.

"I am going to lead a different life, but a boy can't change his whole course of life in a minute, can he? Grown persons have to go on probation for six months, before they can lead a different life, and half the time they lose their cud before the six months' expire, and have to commence again."

"But what is this I hear," asked the grocery keeper, "about your pa fighting a duel with the minister in your back yard; and wounding him in the leg, and then trying to drown himself in the cistern? One of your new neighbors was in here this morning and told me there was murder in the air at your house last night."

"You see," said the boy" since pa got that blacking on his face he don't go out any, and to make it pleasant for him ma invited in a few friends to spend the evening, Ma has got up around, and the baby is a daisy, only it smells like a goat, on account of drinking the goat's milk. Ma invited the minister among the rest, and after supper the men went up into pa's library to talk. O, you think I am bad, don't you? but of the nine men at our house last night, I am an angel compared to what they were when they were boys. I got into the bath-room to untangle my fish-line, and it is next to pa's room, and I could hear everything they said, but I went away 'cause I thought the conversation would hurt my morals. They would all steal, when they were boys, but darned if I ever stole. Pa has stole over a hundred loads of watermelons, one deacon used to rob orchards, another one shot tame ducks belonging to a farmer, and the minister was the worst of the lot, cause he took a seine, with some other boys, and went to a stream where a neighbor was raising brook trout, and cleaned the stream out, and, to ward off suspicion, he went to the man next day and paid him a dollar to let him fish in the stream, and then kicked because there were no trout, and the owner found the trout were stolen, and laid it to some Dutch boys.

"Well, lately somebody has been burgling our chicken coop, and pa loaded an old musket with rock salt, and said he would fill the fellow full of salt if he caught him, and while they were talkidd upstairs ma heard a rooster squawk, and she went to the stairway and told pa there was somebody in the hen house. Pa jumped up and told the visitors to follow him, and they would see a man running down the alley full of salt, and he rushed out with the gun, and the crowd followed him. Pa is shorter than the rest and he passed under the first wire clothes-line in the yard all right, and was going for the hen house on a jump, when his neck caught the second wire clothes-line just as the minister and two of the deacons caught their necks under the other wire. You know how a wire, hitting a man on the throat, will set him back, head over appetite. Well, sir, I was looking out the back window, and I wouldn't be positive, but I think they all turned-back somersaults, and struck on their [illegible]. Anyway, pa did, and the gun must have been cocked, or it struck the hammer on a stone, for it went off, and it was pointed towards the house, and three of the visitors got salted. The minister was hit the worst, one piece of salt taking him in the hind leg, and the other in the back, and he yelled as though it was dynamite. I suppose when you shoot a man with salt, it smarts, like when you get corned beef brine on your chapped hands. They all yelled, and pa seems to have been knocked silly, someway, for he pranced around and seemed to think he had killed them. He swore at the wire clothes line, and then I missed pa, and heard a splash like when you throw a cat in the river, and then I thought of the cistern, and I went down and we took pa by the collar, and pulled him out. Oh, he was awful damp. No, sir, it was no duel, at all, but a naxident and I didn't have any thing to do with it. The gun wasn't loaded to kill, and the salt only went through the skin, but those men did yell. Maybe it was my chum that stirred up the chickens; but I didn't know. He has not commenced to lead a different life yet, and he might think it would make our folks sick if nothing occurred to make them pay attention. I think where a family has been having a good deal of exercise, the way ours has, it hurts them to break off too suddenly. But the visitors went home real quick, after we got pa out of the cistern, and the minister told ma he always felt, when he was in our house, as though he were on the verge of a yawning crater, ready to be engulfed any minute, and he guessed he wouldn't come any more."

Mr. Bancroft's Rose Garden.

Mr. Bancroft's rose garden is now in its prime. He has attached to his Washington residence a lot in the rear, planted in grass, which belonged to the house when he bought it, and another much larger one, 50 by 190 feet, at right angles with it, which he purchased later. This is all planted in roses of the choicest varieties that will grow in the open air. The high fences enclosing the garden are fairly lined with roses, which are trained against their sides, as also are honeysuckles. A rose-house, with glass roof, is on one side of the garden, in which there is never any artificial heat; but Mr. Bancroft uses it only that he may have his pets bloom earlier in the spring than they would out of doors. In the main portion of the garden rose bushes supported by slender sticks are planted as thickly as is possible for them to be, consistent with neatness and conditions favorable to their growth.

Narrow paths run between the rows, through which their owner walks in mingled pride and tenderness. There are over 500 varieties, and he can call each of his pets by name without a moment's hesitation. He visits them regularly between 8 and 9 every morning, clipping off blossoms past their prime and twigs that need cutting. He says, as an instance of how fashions change in flowers, as in everything else, that there are not half a dozen different kinds of fine roses cultivated now which were grown by rose-fanciers twenty years ago. He has himself been a rose-culturist many years, he says, and there are only two or three kinds now in general use which were cultivated when he first began.

Mr. Bancroft is working very hard on his history, saying in as matter-of-fact a way as if he were speaking of something that must be done before taking an ordinary journey: "You know I have not long to stay, and whatever I do must be done quickly." These long mornings he often begins work at 4 o'clock. He takes a light breakfast always, and afterward walks in his garden, and by 9 o'clock goes to his study, where he remains until nearly 2 o'clock, when, after a substantial lunch, he takes his ride on horseback. He is willing to see those with whom he is well acquainted while in his garden, or in the evening after half-past seven, for he does all his literary work in his study writing no one is allowed to disturb him.—Washington Letter to Philadelphia Times.

Passing Events.

Owing to the lack of subscriptions to defray the expense incidents to such an excursion, it is not probable that the United States will be represented at the international rifle contest at Wimbledon this year.

The publication of the pension list will be completed about the 1st of July. It will fill ten volumes of 500 pages each, giving the name, address, disability, and amount of pension of the 300,000 pensioners now on the rolls.

Fire losses in the United States last month were smaller than during the period of three years out of the four immediately proceding it. Still the destruction of nearly $7,000,000 worth of property in one month is a fearful drain on the resources of the Nation, and affords a vast field for further improvement.

A cure for rheumatism an English doctor has found in total abstinence from food. He declares that many cases of acute articular rheumatism have been cured by fasting from four to eight days, while chronic rheumatism was also alleviated. No medicines were given, but patients could have cold water and lemonade in moderation. The doctor states that rheumatism is only a phase of indigestion, and therefore can be cured by giving complete and continued rest to all the digestive organs.

The rapidity with which John Chinaman acquires American ideas is indicated by the fact that a Paterson Chinaman, who cut under the usual rates for laundry work was lured into a house, where seven rival Chinese laundrymen set upon him with knives, hammers, etc., and nearly killed him before he was rescued. When Chinamen get to forming trades unions and enforcing their edicts in this summary fashion, there will be an end to the talk about Chinese cheap labor.

Italy is the most malarious country in the civilized world. Of the sixty-nine provinces of the kingdom only six are nominally free from what is known as miasmatic or Roman fever, and in twenty-one the scourge assumes really serious proportions. Every year no fewer than 40,000 men in the army are attacked by the disease, and it is calculated that the prevalence of malaria necessitates the annual expenditure by the Government of something like ten million lire for the maintenance of special or public servants. It has been found that the extension of the railway system throughout the peninsula has increased the evil. The turning up of fresh, damp earth and the unavoidable formations of new banks, deep cuttings, and excavations which speedily fill with water, breed the disease in its worst forms. On one of the railway lines which runs through much marsh land the annual rate of mortality among the employes is 36 per 1,000.

During the last decade thirteen men have died in Great Britain leaving property worth more than £1,000. Of these by far the richest was Baron L. N. de Rothschild, who left £2,700,000. The next larger sum was £1,000,000, left by John Pemberton, of Liverpool. During the same period fifty-six men died leaving more than £500,000. During th preceeding decade ten persons left more than £1,000,000, fifty-three more than £500,000, and 191 more than £250,000. The Spectator, which compiled the statistics for both decades, confesses its surprise at the figures saying: "That it is an increase among millionaires of 30 per cent, among half-millionaires of 6 per-cent, and among quarter millionaires of 18 per-cent; and we expected the numbers to be doubled."

CHARACTERISTIC ENGINES.

An Old Engineer Tells of the Contrary Disposition of Different Machines, and Relates Some Anecdotes.

Discernible by their unmistakably professional air, a large number of working railroad men moved about the building and grounds of the railway exposition yesterday, examining the splendid show of appliances with critical eyes and passing comments on each interesting to hear. A Herald reporter joined a group of engineers inspecting the numerous fine locomotives and inquired of one brawny individual which engine met his best approval.

"It is hard to say," was the reply. "All of these are fine specimens of workmanship. There are different varieties here—pullers and pushers, climbers and flyers. Now, there's a curious locomotive compared with its next neighbor."

He pointed to the English locomotive.

"That engine is built, you see, entirely different from American machines. It is all in one piece, perfectly solid, so to speak. In a country which is level, and on a road free from curves, I have no doubt she goes like a bird. But she wouldn't do for American roads. The grades and the curves would shake her all to pieces."

"There," he continued, turning to the magnificent Southern Pacific locomotive which was admiringly discussed by the crowd, "there's a typical American engine. She will climb a mountain or fly over a stream and around a curve of her own length. She is built in pieces, like all of our machines, so that one wheel may be in the air, if necessary, and her guard higher than her drivers, and keep her balance all the while. She is a beauty, true enough. Still, you can't tell anything about an engine until you are acquainted with her."

"How acquainted?" asked the reporter, who was unaware that engines have a personality.

"No two engines are alike—I mean as regards their character."

"Locomotives have a character, then, have they?"

"They have, indeed. They have their peculiarities, and their ways and moods also. On every railroad this fact is understood, and each engine has its own engineer, who finds the longer he drives his iron horse the more he has to learn about her. Sometimes she is erratic as a woman, and for no apparent cause. Sometimes a high pressure is necessary to make her go, sometimes under a low head she will fly. And then again, under the same conditions, she kicks and spurts like a balky horse. I have taken out my machine on the Fort Wayne and put her through the run one day at forty miles an hour like a lady. The next day it often happens she'll kick and bump, and has to be forced into going. It's all according to the way she feels. However, an engineer learns his engine's peculiarities and knows how to control them, and if she has any speed they get it out of her."

"Speediness," he continued, "was, after all, the cardinal virtue of a locomotive. It is the common ambition of engineers to conduct the fastest locomotive on their road. It's against the rules to race, but if my road runs parallel with another, and we get to the end of it first, I am not going to refuse."

"Is fast running any more dangerous than slow?"

"Not if the road is all right. It's a good deal more uncomfortable. The machine quivers and bounces up and down, but holds the track. When the rails are steel and the grades not too heavy you can pull the throttle wide open, and people on the train riding won't guess how quickly they are rushing through space. There is a good deal of fast running on all the roads around Chicago. Even the suburbans are swift. On the Illinois Central the evening suburbans make a thirty miles an hour rate between stations. In fact, every train is fast. A schedule time of forty miles an hour is, of course, exceptional, but every engine in service does that and more in places."

"But fast or slow, it is a business of chances, this railroading," he went on. "No engine however well built, nor engineer, but some day comes to grief. I never heard of one who had escaped disaster in some form."

"Instances were known," he informed the reporter, of these very practical men yielding to superstition, and wearing charms to guard against accident. "When I first began to run a passenger it was on a branch of a road in Pennsylvania. For five years I was the only engineer out of twenty-five who never met with a mishap. They called me the lucky man, and attributed my good fortune to a certain anchor locket that I wore. I was so confident in my luck that I boasted I would never have a smash-up. But my time came. One night, on rounding a curve that I was always very cautious in doing, it was so sharp, I saw two men hurrying away into the bushes, and felt my hair stand up as I beheld their work—an obstruction piled on the track. It was too late to stop. I whistled down brakes and jumped. The engine and tender were ditched, and I was laid up with a broken leg and fractured ribs for three months. It was my first accident and the only attempt at the Missouri business that had ever been made in that part of the country. Since then I have met with every kind of smashes. I have ran down and misplaced switches, through an open draw, collided with an oil train, been ditched by spreading rails and landslides. I am made to see by my experience every time that I pull out that no matter how perfect the mechanical and human machinery of a road may be in theory, in practice faults occur where least expected, and men sleep or are unfaithful."

"If people knew half or quarter of the dangers they encounter in railrord travel more would walk than ride on the cars. There is never a train but grazes destruction in some form. Only the man in the cab knows what it really means to dash ahead into the darkness, and only he realizes that he is playing on chances when he pulls open the lever. Not one fraction of the accidents and escapes are ever printed or known. For instance, I was bringing in an express on a road leading into Chicago. Eighteen miles out, the road is crossed by another, which is veiled by thick woods. On this occasion the crossing-tender was asleep, but his signal to come ahead was swinging where he had left it, and I moved along. As my wheels touched the cross-tracks, I saw an engine coming down on me at full speed. I turned cold and was knocked in a heap; but I managed to pull the lever wide open, and the fractional minutes it took to get my train over the crossing seemed an hour. Old No. 48 was good for it, and the engine that might have cut us in two and killed a hundred people brushed the platform of my rear car as it dashed by. Very few knew of that close call."

"To handle an engine," he said, turning to rejoin his companions, "is to take a hand against death by fire, by water, on earth and in the air, with the odds ever up. It is a wearing and a hard life, but a fascinating one. You grow to be fond of the dangers, and the excitement and exultation you feel in controlling the smallest movement of your machine never grows stale, nor less necessary to you."—Chicago Herald.

WONDERFUL SPRINGS.

A Place Where the Tide Ebbs and Flows as Regularly as in the Ocean.

From the Santa Fe New Mexican.

A New Mexican scribe button-holed Surveyor General Atkinson yesterday and inquired how he and Senator Logan spent the time during their recent trip to the American valley. "Oh!" said he, "we put in the time very agreeably," and he went on to relate several interesting narratives.

Twenty miles northwest of Moore & Casey's ranch are located the wondrous salt springs, and, after going on a hunt south and bagging a deer and some wild turkeys, the party decided upon visiting these springs. Here is a salt basin about one mile in diameter, and the waters ebb and flow as regularly as do the tides of the ocean. When the tide goes out the edge of the basin shows salt instead of sand. In the midst of the lake are three comical-shaped mountains 100 feet in height by 100 feet in diameter, which are apparently composed entirely of cinder, such as is left in an ordinary grate after the coal is burnt. One of these forms an island in the middle of the basin, but the others are so situated as to be accessible when the tide is out. Fortunately this was the case when the visitors were there, and, actuated by a desire to see all the wonders, they climbed to the top of one of these mountains. It was found to be hollow—just as if an immense funnel had been thrust into the top—and at the bottom about on a level with the water in the main basin outside, was a spring which they discovered was possessed of several peculiar features. The people scrambled down inside the mountain and reached the spring. The water was found to be very strongly impregnated with salt, and its density so great that a person in bathing would find it impossible to sink or even stand up in it, or do other than float upon its surface. The depth of the spring is unknown, and this, too, like the water in the basin, ebbs and flows with the tide.

The general thinks that by the use of a siphon hundreds of barrels of salt could be obtained from this spring daily These springs consist of about 200 acres which have been reserved from entry or sale by the government as saline lands.

An Innovation.

"My daughter is to be married next week," he said as he sat down and removed his hat.

"And you will present her with a check for $50,000, of course?" replied the broker.

"Well, no, that's what I called to see you about. I believe in innovation."

"You'll give her $25,000 in cash, eh?"

"No, sir. I was thinking that you might take about $500 and buy about $75,000 worth of some sort of bonds."

"As an investment for an income?"

"No—for a show. Get $1,000 bonds, if possible. Get some that are printed in red and blue ink, if you can. If they have big red or blue seals on, so much the better. If they begin "In the name of God, amen" they will look the more important. See that the paper is good, the printing clear, the signature in a bold, heroic hand, and send your bill to me. The public can be fooled by a check."—Wall Street News.

A Terrible Story of Shipwreck.

First Officer Humphreys has given the San Francisco Bulletin an account of the wreck of the American ship Oracle, which sailed from San Francisco on January 18, 1883. She was struck by a hurricane on March 5, and was buffetted about for a day and a night, when land was discovered close at hand. The officer says:

"The ship sailed in between the land towering up hundreds of feet and into smooth water, but she then became unmanageable on account of the eddying currents. The anchor was got ready, but no bottom could be got, and in a short time a large edge of rocks was seen under our lee, with seas breaking heavily. The ship struck with tremendous force, but remained only a few moments, and then drifted off into smooth water. Boats were then made ready, officered, manned and provisioned and made fast to the ship, which continued to drift until she struck a high ridge of land. Cast the lead and found four fathoms under the stem and fifteen fathoms under the stern. Steam was made on the engine and both pumps started, but the water gained rapidly. The boats were brought alongside and filled with provisions, and we had only time to secure a few clothes when the vessel listed over and sunk entirely from sight, sliding off into deep water. The boats then pulled along the shore for some distance before a landing place could be found, as the land rose abruptly from the water, and in many places there were high cliffs. A little cave was found on the east side of the island, with sand beach and considerable surf, though which the provisions were safely landed. The boats were securely moored. We then built a camp from a topsail saved on the side of the hill, and lay down to sleep that night, completely exhausted in body and mind. The rain, which poured down, leaked through the camp, wetting us, but we slept as soundly as in a feather bed at home. From the time the gale commenced to the time of the wreck was sixty-two hours, and forty-two hours a perfect hurricane.

"Eight days of heavy weather were spent on the island before sun observation could be got to obtain a correct position. During that time the boats were being made ready to leave. Our sufferings were terrible, owing to the severe cold, and the rain, hail, and snow which came down the greater part of the time, keeping all wet. The wood was so green that it was almost impossible to make it burn. Expeditions were made by land and boats, but no signs of life were found except a few native men and women, clad only with a small skin across the shoulders. We could not understand anything they said, or gain any information, but they obliged us to keep watch night and day on the boats. All hands were on allowance of two hard biscuits per day, with a little tea saved from the ship, and missels, which were found on the rocks at low tide. Our correct position was found to be east side of Herschel Isle, one of the Hermite group, eight miles north of Cape Horn. It was then decided to start in the long boat to sea in hopes of being picked up by some passing ship and so secure rescue for the remaining part of the crew. On March 16 the long boat was ready for sea, and the captain, first officer, and five able men sailed from the island at 3 a. m., having decided to sail for the Falkland islands through the Strait of Le Maire, 350 miles distant. Soon after leaving it commenced to blow from the southwest, and so ran due southeast about twenty-five miles, but the sea and wind increased so fast that course was made for the strait. Toward night the wind blew very strong, with heavy squalls of wind and hail. The seas came rolling into the boat, keeping the men bailing out water. All were wet and cold. The captain dare run no longer, so headed the boat to the wind and put out the drag, which caused the boat to ride well, water coming in at times. During the night our sufferings were severe, and only with great exertion by pounding themselves could the men keep from freezing. When daylight came the wind moderated. We then set reefed sails, and at 9 a. m. came to anchor in Success Bay, Strait of Le Maire, but we could not land, as the surf ran so high.

"During the day the sun would come out at times for a few moments, then heavy squalls of wind and hail would sweep down the mountain gorges, seemingly bent upon our destruction, and the men dare not try to sleep, for to sleep was never to awake. At 4 p. m. the captain decided to put to sea and make as much progress as possible while the men's strength lasted, for they could stand but little more exposure. Had got just underway when a sail was seen entering the strait, and now it fell calm and the ship was at our mercy. Men forgot all their sufferings and out oars with a will. After four hours' hard pulling, were rescued by the German bark Bessel, from Parnaguar to Valpariso, Saturday, March 17, 1883. On reaching the bark's deck, we found the crew under arms, preparing to fight, thinking the boat contained pirates. Had there been a wind we would not have been rescued, and no doubt would have perished before reaching the Falkland Islands. The next day the bark was in sight of Cape Horn, with light breeze and fine weather. Captain Morrison then asked the captain of the bark if he would not rescue the remaining seventeen men left on the island, as they had but little provisions and few clothes, and offered $500 for so doing. The captain would not listen to anything said, and so we were obliged to sail away and leave them to their fate, trusting to a speedy passage to Valparaiso, where assistance could be had immediately. We arrived at Valparaiso April 14, twenty-eight days from Cape Horn, and assistance was at once asked for from the American Consul."

A PHOTOGRAPH.

This is her shadow, nothing more:
The eyes that wear no smile for mine,
The silent lips that laughed before,
The hair without its wave and shine,
This mask that shows no spark divine.

How calm and cold it looks at me;
Her eyes were full of shade and sun;
A lock that rippled like the sea
Across whose breast the light winds run,
A gleam, a cloud, a tale begun.

This is the veil her soul put on
To run the weary ways of earth,
And when her brief, bright face was won
She laid it down beside her hearth
A worn-out thing of little worth.

It is not she that fronts me here,
This speechless aspect still and cold;
I knew her fair, and sweet and dear,
A clinging girl, with heart of gold,
And hands that clasped with tender hold.

Was it a gentle prophesy,
This slight, transparent mold of clay,
To let the loving 'round her see
How soon that soul must flit away,
That fluttered, paused, but made no stay.

"Not here, but risen." Oh, angel song
Still falling soft on hearts that weep!
This is the dead, whose ashes long
Her master's messengers shall keep
Safe in earth's last, undreaming sleep.

But she who wore this mortal guise
Has fled beyond our tearful sight;
Joyful and strong, serene and wise,
She lives upon the hills of light,
And waits us on that heavenly height.

IF MY FIRST WIFE ——

BY G. MANVILLE FENN.

"Ah, my darling little sis, how are you? 'Lesbia hath a beaming eye.' "

"My dear Frank. I am glad to see you."

There was an embrace and the lady burst into tears.

"Lesbia has not a beaming eye!" cried Frank Reston, barrister, who had just leaped down from the dog-cart after a cold drive from the station at Ramford to his brother-in-law's handsome place, the Coppices, Calkston, where that new relative had settled after his return from Australia, where he had been sent—the younger son of a good old country family—to see what he could do as what is euphoniously termed a squatter. He had squatted to some advantage, the fates having been kind; and, after making a moderate fortune, he had suddenly doubled it by marrying the widow of a colonial magnate.

At the lady's desire—her will being paramount—they were on their way to England, when one night they were awakened by an awful crash, and, rushing on deck, they found all in confusion. Some vessel had run into them during a fog, cut the great Austral liner down below the water's edge, and during the next half hour there was a fight for life.

John Audas behaved admirably. When the rush was made for the boats, he knocked down half a dozen cowards one after the other, and by sheer strength helped the captain to send off the first boat properly manned, with half the women passengers, merely stipulating that his shrieking, elderly wife should be one. Then he helped with the next and got that off safely, before being overpowered, for a mad rush ensued, the other boats were filled anyhow, and at last the captain, second mate, half a dozen men and the brave young passenger were left alone upon the deck of the sinking ship, with just time enough to lash a few spars together, throw them overboard, and trust themselves to this frail support before the vessel went down.

From this raft they were picked up exhausted, half dead, by a passing ship, having seen no more of the boats, all of which were lost presumably, in the gale which came on before many hours had passed; and thus it was that John Audas found himself a widower, at thirty-five and far from inconsolable, for report said his existence with the relict of the colonial magnate had been of the kind to which some people give a very unpleasant term.

So little indeed was the handsome young colonist affected by his loss that, after settling down at the Coppices, where he revelled in the life of a country gentleman, a year had hardly passed before he was a suitor for the hand of Lesbia Reston, the daughter of the old vicar of Calkston, and the belle of the country ball.

Matters followed one another in the most prosaic way. John Audas was beyond reproach for a son-in-law; his wooing was downright and honest; and the lady found the bluff, sunbrowned, well-informed fellow—albeit he was far from clever—quite a contrast and relief after the insipid "locals" of the neighborhood; so the result was that, after rather a short intimacy, John Audas proposed, was accepted, Frank Reston came from the Temple to be present at his sister's wedding, and now that, six months later, he had run down to spend a few days at the Coppices, to have a little shooting, he found her thin, pale, careworn and ready at a word to burst into tears.

"Why, little Lesby," he cried with all his old petting ways, "what is it? Surely Jack is not behaving badly to you?"

"No. Oh, no! It is nothing, Frank; I am a little hysterical."

"But it is something!" he exclaimed. "I'll have it out with John."

"My dear Frank, you'll make me wretched if you say a word."

"Oh, well, if you take that tone, of course I will not," said her brother; "but I came down here for a rest and have a bit of enjoyment, and find you in tears."

"Yes, yes, and it's all my nonsense, Frank, dear. There, it's all gone now. It's the weather, I think."

"Where's John?"

"Either in the stables, or down the garden, dear. I'll send for him."

"Oh, I'll go and look him up. I suppose he'll be glad to see me?"

"Why, of course, dear. He has been talking about nothing else since he heard you were coming, and making no end of plans."

"Ah, that's right," said Frank Reston, smiling.

"And I'm so glad you've come, Frank, dear. You see, I'm afraid I'm not much of company for dear John—not such good company as—as I think his first wife was."

"Well, you're a deal better company than she is now."

"I'll try very hard to take an interest in his pursuits; but I'm so stupid, Frank, that I'm afraid he gets out of patience."

"I'll tell you what it is, Lesby," said Frank Reston bluntly; "if you two people can't be happy in this glorious place, with every luxury about you, and only to speak to have whatever you please, you deserve—you deserve—there, I don't know what you don't deserve!"

"Yes, dear, we do," said the lady meekly. "Ah, here comes dear John. I'll run away; don't tell him I've been crying."

"Stuff! Is it likely?"

"And, pray, pray, Frank, don't let him think that I have been murmuring. It would make him so unhappy."

As she spoke she ran off, and Frank Reston crossed the hall to meet his stalwart brother-in-law, who looked the beau ideal of a country gentleman, and a striking contrast to the pale, careworn student, fresh from his gloomy chambers in town.

"Ah, Frank, my dear boy, I am glad to see you. Why, you pale, bleached bookworm—here, come out in the open air, and let's get some color in your cheeks. Come and have a look at the dogs."

They went and had a look at the splendid setters and retrievers in their kennels, and as Reston admired them—

"Ah," said Audas, "if my first wife had been alive, how she would have idolized those dogs."

"Better have idolized you," said Reston bluntly.

"Yes, of course," said Audas, in nowise appeased. "We'll have a grand ride or two while you are here. Come over to the stables. I've got a mare that will suit you to a T. There," he said, as he patted first one and then another satin-skinned beauty, as it turned its head round with a rattle of the head-stall for the expected bit of sweet carrot or cake, "they're right, aren't they? Ah, if my first wife had been alive, she would have loved a few gallops over some of the wolds."

"Humph! would she?" said Reston.

"Yes; she was a splendid woman on horseback. Well, come in now and dress, and let's get to dinner."

"Well, I shan't be sorry to have it," said the London guest; and with his brother-in-law's hand affectionately resting upon his shoulder they went in, and in due time dined.

But somehow that was not so pleasant a meal as it might have been, and the acute barrister was not long in finding that the grit that showed itself in the cooking, the acidity in the wine, and the jar in the conversation was all due to one thing, which found voice in the words: "Ah, if my first wife," etc.

"Jack loves her," said Frank Reston to himself, as he lay in bed that night, "she worships him, and they are not happy. Jack Audas is a good fellow, but not over-wise. Lesby is the most amiable little darling that ever breathed, and yet they don't seem as they should be. Hang his first wife! Humph! well, no; she's deceased. What a fool the man is to poison his cup of happiness like this! By jove, what a good thing it would be if Lesby had a dangerous fit of sickness; it would bring Jack to his senses, and heigh, ha, ha, hum, how sleepy I am—and—"

That was all, for he dropped off to sleep at once. But he had similar thoughts to these every night during his stay, and again on his way back to London, after doubling the length of his visit, and even then his brother-in-law being half offended because he would not, as Audas said, "make it a few more days."

"If my first wife had been alive! If my first wife had been alive!" the very beat of the train seemed to pour those words in Frank Reston's ears as he sped south, and thought over the matrimonial situation at the Coppices.

"Poor little Lesby! He'll break her heart," he said to himself. "I do not wonder at it. She feels jealously miserable about that 'first wife.' I wish now I had spoken to Jack."

"No, I don't," he said, after a little more thinking, "it would not have been wise."

"Perhaps something may happen to bring him to his senses," he said, after another pause; "something always does happen."

And then he read the Times until he reached town.

* * * * * * * *

Frank Reston sat in his dingy room hard at work over a brief—not his first; but these documents were sufficiently rare visitants to make him study those which came with the most intense application.

Probably from a desire that the deep truths that he glanced from the carefully written folios before him should not escape after being once taken into his head, the young barrister was resting his brow upon his hands, his elbows were upon the table and his thumbs over his ears, while, as from time to time he read a few words out loud, it seemed in the semi-obscurity of the gloomy room as if he were addressing himself to a venerable gentleman on the other side of the room, till a more penetrating look showed that the said venerable gentleman was only the young barrister's wig-block with the time-honored grizzled head-gear, which betokened the regular wearer's position in a court room.

"Gentleman to see you, sir," said his clerk, entering the room.

"Name?" said Frank laconically.

"Wouldn't give no name, sir. Must see you directly, sir."

"Hullo!" exclaimed the barrister, as a well-muffled up traveler forced his way in, bag and rug in hand.

"Hush! only me; send away your clerk."

Frank Reston nodded at his wondering aid, who left the room.

"Why, my dear John, what's the matter? Lesby?"

"Oh, she's all right, God bless her!" cried Audas, throwing himself into a chair and gazing wildly, with blank, cadaverous face, at his brother-in-law. "Give me something, for heaven's sake—brandy—wine—I'm done up."

Reston opened a cupboard, brought out his spirit stand, and Audas hastily gulped down a glass of spirits, returning the glass to the table with trembling hand.

"Why, John, old fellow," said Reston, "what is it?"

"I'll—I'll tell you directly. I hardly dare; but, oh, Frank, I swear to you I did it in all innocency. Oh, my poor darling! my poor darling! Don't blame me, Frank. I swear to you I believed it all."

"Here, here! come, come, old fellow. Don't give way like this. Why, hang it, man, what is it? You look as if you had committed a crime."

"I have, Frank, I have; and against the dearest, the sweetest girl that ever blessed a man with her tender love."

"Why John Audas," said Reston fiercely, "if you have dared to raise your hand against my sister—"

"Raised my hand against her!" cried Audas in tones of withering contempt. "Why, I would sooner hew it off."

"Then what the deuce is the meaning of all this? You haven't been such a fool as to take shares in a gold mine?"

"Bah! Don't be absurd."

"What is it, then? Crime? What do you mean?"

"Read that," cried Audas, tearing his pocket-book from his breast with trembling hands, opening it and producing one of those dirty, discolored pieces of paper which a paternal government considers good enough for the transcription of a telegram.

"Eh! Why, what's this?" cried Reston, reading: "From Grace Audas, Ultramarine hotel, Folkestone, to John Audas, The Coppices, Calkston, Calkshire. Come to me at once. Our boat drifted to an island. Very ill."

John Audas wiped the great drops of perspiration from his forehead.

"Well, but—" began Reston, in puzzled tones.

"I believed she was dead, Frank. On my soul I believed she was."

"And on the strength of that, sir, you have won a sweet young girl's affection, and committed bigamy?"

"Yes, yes," groaned Audas. "And I was so happy."

"You scoundrel!" cried Reston fiercely.

"Don't, for God's sake; don't turn upon me like that, Frank."

"There is one comfort," continued the young barrister, "the law can be pretty hard upon a villain who blights a young girl's life in such a way as this, and the punishment—"

"Curse the punishment!" roared Audas. "What care I for the punishment? I'd go through fourteen years' penal servitude with pleasure if it would spare my poor darling pain."

"Then she doesn't know it yet?"

"Know it? Of course not. I could not tell her," groaned Audas.

"And pray what do you intend to do? Of course the only thing is for you to make my poor sister a very large settlement. But I shall insist upon that. I'll go and fetch her away at once."

"What! and separate us, Frank? No, no, for heaven's sake don't think of that. As for money, all I have is hers—bless her; but we must not part. Frank, I swear to you, that if you take her away, I'll blow my brains out at the hotel."

"Humph! I wouldn't do that," said Reston coolly. "But perhaps you have some plans."

"Plans? Yes," cried the other excitedly; "I brought her up with me. She's at the Grand."

"What, here in London?"

"Of course. I am going to take her to Paris."

"Via Folkestone?"

"Curse it, no! via Dover. I shall take an assumed name. We'll travel for a few years, till that fiend of a woman really dies. Frank, she was a perfect curse to me. My life was one long torment, and here, now that my life has been one long bliss, like a spoiled fool, I have been hipped and gloomy; and, Frank—would you believe?—I was such a brute, such a scoundrel to poor Lesby that I found fault with the dinner, and I said—I wish my tongue had been cut out."

"What did you say that for?"

"No, no, I did not say that. I said if my first wife had been alive we would have had a better dinner."

"I should hardly have believed it of you, John Audas."

"No, you would not, Frank; but I'm such a fool at times. You see I'm not like you, all brains. I'd give anything to be as clever and—and—"

"As ugly?"

"No, old fellow; I was going to say wise as you are. Ah! Frank, that woman was nearly fifty when I married her, and she only had me out of spite, I believe, so as to annoy some one else. I never had a moment's peace with her. I was a bigger fool when I married her than I am now. I say, you won't think of my being separated from Lesby?"

"But your wife? She has the best right to you—of course the right."

"I don't care," said the big fellow, setting his teeth and growing stern and dogged now. "I'd about lost my head. That telegram was a regular crusher. But I'm coming round now and I should like to see the man who'd step between me and my wife."

"But she is not your wife, sir," cried Reston sternly.

"And I say she is," cried Audas rising, with his fists clenched and a fierce, menacing look in his eyes. "I say she is my dear wife, and no law shall come between us or separate us. Oh, Frank, I do love her dearly, and I never knew how much till I received this awful news."

"Humph!" said Reston drily; "some men don't find it out till their wives are dead. Here, let's see that message again. We must look at this matter in a cool, business-like way."

"Of course. You can. I couldn't; it nearly drove me mad."

"Um—um—um," buzzed the young barrister, reading the telegram, "Bigamy is an awkward offense against the law. Um—u n—um. Let's see, you received this telegram this morning?"

"Yes, and packed up and came off at once. Lesby thinks it's important business regarding money affairs."

"Humph!" said Reston, holding the telegram first on one side, then on the other, and then between himself and the light, as if expecting a brain illumination that way, while John Audas watched his movements with speechless anxiety.

"Look here, Jack," Reston said at last, "it's one of the principles in the law to believe nothing until it can be proved."

"Yes, of course," said Audas.

"Well, look here, then, old fellow, how do we know that this telegram is true?"

"Oh, it's genuine enough."

"How do you know?"

"How do I—eh? What! how do I know?"

"Yes, I will repeat my question a dozen times if you like, my good sir," said Reston, involuntarily dropping into the cross-examining style. "How do you know that this telegram is true? It may be a hoax."

"What!" roared Audas.

"I say it may be a hoax."

John Audas got up, drew a long breath, clenched his fist, and began walking up and down the room.

"I say it may be a trick," said Reston again.

"If it is, and I get hold of him who did it, I'll treat him like I would a nut," growled the great fellow.

"Humph! I wouldn't do that," said Reston, quietly watching him. "Manslaughter's worse than bigamy."

"Here, I say," panted Audas, imploringly, "don't say that last word again; I can't bear it."

"Besides, it might have been done by a jealous woman. It's rather a feminine-looking trick."

"Couldn't be, Frank, old fellow, for I never take notice of women. I'm all for horses and dogs. I've neglected poor Lesby for them."

"Hah!" said Reston. "Well, you want my advice, eh?"

"Yes, old fellow, if you will help me. Look here; go down to Folkestone and see what you can do with her. Promise anything, only tell her she can't have me again. I'll blow out my brains first."

"Don't be a fool, Jack. You'd like me to see her, then, eh?"

"Yes, yes, do, Frank, for Lesby's sake as well as mine."

Frank Reston rose and touched the bell. "Here, go and get a sixpenny Bradshaw," he said to the man who appeared.

"I know what time the trains are," said John Audas, excitedly.

"You leave matters to me," said the brother-in-law abruptly; and the country squire sank back in his chair.

"Thanks, that will do," said Reston, taking the little fat square book from the clerk and turning over the pages. "Ah, here it is—Ultramarine hotel, Folkestone, James Thompson. Now we'll see."

He took a telegraph form and wrote a message: "From F. Reston, Emperor's Chambers, Temble, London, to J. Thompson, Ultramarine Hotel, Folkestone: Is Mrs. Grace Audas or Mrs. John Audas staying at your hotel? Answer paid. Wire."

"Now we shall have taken our first step," said Reston, ringing. "Send that telegram directly."

"How long shall we be getting an answer?" said Audas gloomily.

"Depends on the amount of business. Perhaps in an hour, perhaps in three. There, take the paper, I must go on with my brief."

"That you shan't," cried his brother-in-law, snatching away the papers. "You must talk to me. This is a consultation. I'll pay."

Reston saw that it was of no use to combat his brother-in-law, so to make the time pass more easily he lit a cigar, and sat and listened to the great earnest fellow's long-winded details of how badly he had behaved to his "little darling," as he called her. "But she must never know of this, Frank," he kept saying.

"Not if we can keep it from her," said the barrister quietly; and he sat back in his easy-chair, looking grimly amused, and thinking that, after all, his sister might have done worse than marry the big honest Englishman, whose good looks and manly ways had won her heart.

But it was a tedious time, and it took all the young barrister's skill in tempting his brother-in-law into fresh narratives, to keep him from rushing back to his hotel, and taking flight to avoid the police who would soon be on his track.

At last, though, the telegram arrived, and there was a curiously puckered appearance about Frank Reston's eyes as he opened and held it, gazing at it for a few moments without speaking.

"Why don't you put me out of my misery?" cried Audas at last, and, snatching the telegram, he read the one word "No."

"What! Why, what does this mean?"

"I asked if Mrs. Audas was at the Ultramarine hotel," said Reston, slowly, "and the answer comes back, 'No.' My dear boy, it's a hoax."

"Hah!" ejaculated John Audas, drawing in and expressing a long breath, and then striding toward the door.

"What are you going to do?"

"First find out who did that."

"Nonsense, man! Some fool who thought you were not happy with your wife to try you—"

"It was that Miss ——"

"Never mind who it was, man. Go back to Lesby, and take her for a run on the continent. It will do you both good."

"By jove, I will!" cried Audas. "I say, come and dine with us, and see us off afterward."

"To be sure I will," said Frank Reston; and he did, spending a pleasant evening with his brother-in-law and sister, whose pallor seemed to wear off as she saw her husband's high spirits and heard his plans.

* * * * * *

"Not a bad bit of work," said Frank Reston, as he watched the train steam out of the Viaduct station, for John Audas would not go to Folkestone. "Do him good. Bring him to his senses. Deuced unprofessional trick, though. Ha-ha-ha!" he laughed, as he lit a cigar. "If my first wife had been alive!" I wonder what Jack would say if he knew who sent him that telegram."—[Whitehall Review.

NEW BONNETS AND GOSSIP.

The Fresh Millinery on Exhibition at Art Receptions and in the Streets in London—The Peril of Powdered Gloves in a Ball Room—Tragedy of a New Dress—Fashion Hints.

LONDON, Special Correspondence, June 1.—The day after the "private view" at Burlington house, Ned asked me how I liked the pictures. With craftiness I answered his question by an outburst of "Gowns!" He didn't ask me another question, fearing another onslaught. I did see, however, Mr. Frith's Private View of the Academy in 1881. Oscar Wilde and his locks is a prominent figure, as is Langtry in the beauty corner. The Baroness Burdett-Coutts, in a white plush bonnet, with many feathers æsthetically linked, looked well, and like her portrait. She wore other things besides the bonnet, but I saw only that. Little bonnets and hats were the rule—a number dyed to match the costume. There were two very remarkable gowns worn by the sisters of Sir Trevor Lawrence. The skirts were of gendarme blue, much bedimmed with pale gold braid, long coat overdresses of the blue, on which was a large pattern of tulips also in pale gold; bonnets made almost entirely of the braid, completed these toilettes. Lady Brassey looked regal in a very showy ruby velvet costume with ruby buttons. One adventuresome young damsel wore a white gown. The day was cold and grey and she looked a shivering sight. The crook'd-handled parasol was much carried and quantities of tan gloves were worn. This color in gloves has survived some time and bids fair to wear some time longer.

I believe the remark to be partially true that the sense of being perfectly well dressed gives to a woman's manner a calm repose anything else is powerless to bestow. I remember a dear little friend of mine who attended a reception and whose gown was a joy to all beholders.

"If you knew what I suffered with my gloves," she said afterwards; "I had spent all my allowance in riotous ruffling lace and things (when a woman has been extravagant she always calls her purchases "things") and I hadn't a penny left for gloves. I had a dozen pairs at home that had been worn only once. Being Swede they were a little soiled, but I picked out a very pale ecru pair, nearly the color of my gown. All the rest clashed, being too dark. Well, I powdered them, and they looked like new, and I was so charmed with my gown that I never gave a thought to the powder at all. Papa's gruff "Look very nice; don't stay late, you and your mother," convinced me how wise I had been not to ask for any more money just then. After my first waltz I saw my partner look ruefully at his coat. It was white with powder from my gloves! I could not explain, so I suppose he thought it was from my face. I did not dance again, and we left early. I cried, and told ma about it, and she said, "It served you right. Your toilette should be complete in every detail, no matter how simple it may be, and you have plenty to expend on it." I threw the gloves on the fire when I got home, and had the pleasure of seeing the kid squirm as if it suffered. I hope it did, I am sure.

Not satisfied with crushed strawberry, we have a new color, strawberry ice cream, which is likely to supersede the now popular crushed strawberry. It is a brighter and purer shade, and in cashmere particularly pretty. Mashed pansy pulp will be the next flutter, I suppose, in clothes.

BOTANICAL FANS.

I have seen such beautiful fans, one a begonia leaf in velvet, and another in black gauze, with hand-painted birds on the leaves, the sticks being dark tortoise shell; one of lace and Watteau vignettes, also hand-painted, the lace forming a frame and veiling these delicately colored scenes. In the iridescent mother of pearl sticks the colors used on the Watteau sketches are cleverly reproduced. Ellen Terry as Beatrice in Much Ado About Nothing carries with her golden brocade gown a black round fan of soft black feathers. She wields it gracefully, and whether it is wafted toward her breast or hangs by her side, it is equally effective. Mrs. Bernard Beere who plays the title role in Fedora at the Haymarket theater, wears some charming costumes. In the first act, a dress of white satin, richly embroidered with various colored beads; the train is of white brocaded velvet, embroidered with white pearls. When she first enters she has over this a Russian cloak of old gold satin, trimmed with blue fox and lined with deep crimson plush. I don't think the shape of the cloak is particularly becoming to her, as it exaggerates her height, which, by the way, is generous. Another costume of terra cotta satin, the train turned back with powdered blue satin and trimmed with ruchings of antique lace, is very handsome. A kind of tea gown, worn by Mrs. Bancroft as the Countess Olga Soukareff, consists of a white lace petticoat over yellow satin embroidered with pearls. The back is cut en princesse, of rich old yellow brocha.

MILLINERY AND SCANDAL.

A milliner showed me last week a gown of black broche, over which was hung a deep pinkish salmon lace of wonderfully fine texture. I asked its name. "Point," she answered. "This color! I know the old coffee dodge, but salmon, madam!" I exclaimed. "The lady is most extravagant," she replied; "this matchless piece of lace has been dyed to gratify a caprice of my customer." "Extravagant! I should think so!" The creamy yellow color can never be restored, and it cost I don't know how much to have it dyed.

"It was done in Paris by some new and expensive chemical process. The same man dyed her hair," continued the milliner, "an auburn color, and she is losing her eyesight a little from the effects of the dye. Ah! I see much of extravagance in my business, and have heard much storming and swearing on the husband's side when the bills are sent in. I could talk if I chose," and here she winked her fat left eye, but I kept quiet; and soon she went on, "Why only last week I sent home a most elegant costume and bonnet of Ottoman silk and jet, to one of my customers, £100; very cheap. Her husband came in a day or two afterward and asked me if I had been paid. I had been, but I did not know whether she had furnished the money, so I said I should have to look over my books. He gave me a look that turned me cold, and swore an oath that turned me colder, and I was obliged to tell him the truth. The lady called then and gave me what the Americans call 'Jessie.' I have lost her custom, of course; but, oh! she will have no husband in a few months, and her thick lace veil did not conceal the black eye which he had given her, and then—but I am telling you too much, and you have said nothing, and lured me on—fie! Come and see some pretty things."

And she opened some boxes and showed me mantles, gowns, hats and scarfs, until I cried peccavi. A number of the mantles were made of the new broche velvet (pompons on a net ground). It shows the figure and is still a protection to the shoulders.

Lace is used as much and more than ever, and the jet headings have almost to be embroidered.

Pompon fringe is pretty uncommon, and very dear.

A pretty fashion of wearing a lace scarf is to draw one end round the neck, and tie with a black or dark shade of ribbon, the other end being confined at the side of the waist with a large bow of the same color. My friend the milliner showed me a bonnet made entirely of tiny green leaves. It looked a poem in lettuce. Another bonnet, of red buds, was pretty, and the narrow, black velvet ribbon strings made a piquant contrast. Coming from Charing Cross the other day, I got into a carriage, in one corner of which sat a slender old gentleman. His face looked familiar, yet I could not "place" him. The smoke from the tunnel gave me a slight irritation of the throat and I coughed. I should have said that at Kensington a very much overdressed lady bounded into the carriage. She eyed me all over with a look that plainly said: "I suppose you consider yourself well dressed. Poor worm! but you haven't got as many colors on as I have." I wriggled away and sat down in my own vanity, alone and serene. Well, I coughed. I had thought the slender old gentleman asleep, but he had heard my smoky cough. He started up and diving into an inner pocket drew forth a little round box and leaning over toward me said: "You have a cold; try one of these lozenges." I was surprised into stammering "Thank you," and with much difficulty drew a piece of lozenge from the many other kinds of pill that floated around in that box. I saw the supercilious smile on my lady's many-colored face deepening into a broad grin. I was holding the lozenge between my gloved finger and thumb and staring at it. Just then we arrived at my station, and, getting up, I handed the lozenge, with much politeness, to the overdressed lady with the terse, if old, remark, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." The slender old gentleman opened the door for me and smiled grimly, and then I saw who it was—Herbert Spencer. We are having weather that will bring forth a luxurious crop of odes to spring. The heart of the editor will be sad and those of the softer sex palpitate with joy. The park is daily crowded, and I have seen beautiful gowns by the score. The sateens trimmed with yards and yards of yellow, cream and red lace and very pretty and cheap. One I have seen of yellow flowers on a black ground, ruche flounces edged with yellow lace; dresses looped up with yellow and black scarf ribbon, a little mantle and painted parasol of same black and yellow sateen. I saw an odd parasol the other day. The handle was unusually big and the spring in the center being pressed, out popped a fancy little fan. What next?

ROBIN.

"GOOD-NIGHT, BABETTE!"

"Si vieillesse pouvait—"

SCENE—A small neat room. In a high Voltaire chair sits a white-haired old gentleman.

M. VIEUXBOIS (turning querulously).

Day of my life! Where can she get!
Babette! I say! Babette!—Babette!

BABETTE (entering hurriedly)

Coming, M'sieu'! If M'sieu' speaks
So loud he won't be well for weeks!

M. VIEUXBOIS.

Where have you been?

BABETTE.

Why, M'sieu' knows—
April! . . . Ville d'Avray! . . . Ma'am'selle Rose!

M. VIEUXBOIS.

Ah! I am old—and I forget.
Was the place growing green, Babette?

BABETTE.

But of a greenness!—yes, M'sieu'!
And then the sky so blue!—so blue!
And when I dropped my immortelle,
How the birds sang! [Lifting her apron to her eyes.]
This poor Ma'am'selle!

M. VIEUXBOIS.

You are a good girl, Babette, but she—
She was an angel, verily,
Sometimes I think I see her yet
Standing smiling by the cabinet;
And once, I know, she peeped and laughed
Betwixt the curtains, . . . Where's the draught?
[She gives him a cup.]
Now I shall sleep, I think, Babette—
Sing me your Norman chansonette.

BABETTE (sings).

"Once at the Angelus
(Ere I was dead),
Angels all glorious
Came to my bed—
Angels in blue and white,
Crowned on the head."

M. VIEUXBOIS (drowsily.)

"She was an angel!" . . "Once she laughed"
What, was I dreaming? Where's the draught?

BABETTE (showing the empty cup).

The draught, M'sieu'?

M. VIEUXBOIS.

How I forget!
I am so old! But sing, Babette!

BABETTE (sings).

"One was the friend I left
Stark in the snow;
One was the wife that died
Long—long ago;
One was the love I lost . . .
How could she know?"

M. VIEUXBOIS (murmuring).

Ah Paul! . . . old Paul . . . Eulalie, too,
And Rose! . . . And O! "the sky so blue!"

BABETTE (sings).

"One had my mother's eyes,
Wistful and mild;
One had my father's face;
One was a child.
All of them bent to me—
Bent down and smiled!"

He is asleep.

M. VIEUXBOIS (almost inaudibly).

"How I forget!"
"I am so old" . . . "Good night, Babette!"

QUITS.

"Who is that flirt, you ask,
In the crushed-banana dress?"
'Tis my wife you take to task
With such emphatic stress!

"That stupid antique cad
Will talk her into fits."
Your husband? That's not bad.
At least it makes us quits."

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Fashions in Floor Covers.

At the commencement of the present century Turkey carpets were rarities and luxuries in England, but seldom seen and only to be met with in the houses of noblemen or merchant princes connected with the Levant and Oriental trades. Within the last few years the beauty, durability and comfort of these carpets have been appreciated, more particularly since what is known as the "æsthetic craze" has set in, and aided by the "fashion of the day" (for unless an article does become fashionable, no matter how intrinsically beautiful or good it may be, it does not get generally adopted) Oriental floor coverings of all sorts and sizes, from the cheap cotton India durrie and the Kurd and Beloochistan rugs, to the sumptuous Persian and Turkey carpets, have grown immensely in popular favor. The trade in these has rapidly and wonderfully increased, and the looms of Ouchack and Koulba, in Anatolia, a province in Asiatic Turkey, find employment for many thousands of workmen and workwomen, to say nothing of children, in producing the large amount of these beautiful carpets to supply the markets of Western Europe and America. The home consumption of Turkey carpets in Turkey itself and Egypt is very small in comparison to the large quantities exported from Smyrna for the use of the Giaour nations of the West. England is by far the largest customer, taking nearly 60 per cent of the whole. Next comes France, to which country about one-fourth of the products of the Anatolian looms finds its way, and the remainder is sent to the United States of America. Turkey carpets are always made in one single piece, and take almost as many months to manufacture as the same quantity in superficial extent of ordinary Brussels or tapestry carpet, which are made by steam machinery, take days, and their durability is in like proportion. Who ever heard of a Turkey carpet being worn out in one generation? Persian carpets are of the finest texture and more costly, though we may be permitted to doubt whether anything is woven nowadays in quite so elaborate a style as that described in the story of Schemselnihar and the Persian Prince, as forming the floor covering of the former's palace. After a minute description of the beauties of the principal chamber, we are told that the carpet of this splendid saloon was "composed of a single piece of cloth of gold, upon which were woven bunches of roses in red and white silk." The valleys of Khorassan (the scene of many of the events in Lallah Rookh), Kurdistan, Kesman, and the district of Iran are now the chief places of manufacture, those from Kurdistan being esteemed the best. The Indian carpets are various in style and texture, and come from all parts of that collection of countries and states classed together under the one word India. Cashmere, celebrated also for its unrivaled shawls; Afghanistan and the Punjaub on the extreme north; Scinde and Beloochistan on the north and west, and all the countries of Central India, including the dominions of the Nizam and the districts of the Malabar coast, each produce their specialties in carpets. Rugs is the more correct term, for, unlike the productions of Persia and Turkey, which are made as large as thirty feet square, they are of comparatively small size.

Handsome Hands.

New York Journal: "Small hands," said one of the saleslady at Le Boutillier Bros'., in Twenty-third street, to a Journalier, "are plentiful in New York, but there are many fashionable ladies who have never done a day's work in their lives who have large hands, although they may be shapely and white."

"What lady among your customers has the smallest hands?" queried the reporter.

"Well, I don't know that I can tell exactly. There is one lady who comes here regularly twice a month for gloves. She can wear a 5¼ easily, but she always insists on squeezing her hands into a No. 5, which makes them look misshapen."

"What is considered a small hand?"

"Well, a hand that wears a No. 6 glove or a 6¼, is considered small. No. 6½ or 6¾ are fair sized; but any larger sized glove is—well, isn't desirable. People wearing smaller gloves than No. 6 are as unusual as ladies who wear No. 12 shoes."

"Does a thin or fat hand look best when gloved?" asked the Journalier.

"Oh, a thin hand by all means. Why, a hand that is positively repulsive when ungloved looks ever so much smaller and very shapely in a tight-fitting kid. You know that undressed kid gloves fit more perfectly than the dressed kid. They cling to the hand, and the tips of the fingers fit smoothly. Another thing about gloves, which is of interest to the ladies, is this: If a lady has very long fingers, let her never get a glove with fingers as long as her own, or the hands will look very large. It is curious, but true. Long fingers look beautiful on the ungloved hand, but not pretty at all in gloves."

"Is there any other way of making the hand appear small?"

"Yes, several. One way is to wrinkle the glove about the wrist. Another, to have the sleeve ruffled. A tight, plain sleeve is very trying to a large hand, you know, like low heels to a long foot."

The Journalier visited an artist to learn what was artistically considered a beautiful hand. The artist, an N. A. D., was seated in his studio contemplating a sketch of the bridge.

"Mr. S.," said the reporter, "what do you consider a beautiful hand?"

"Well," he replied, without turning his eyes away from the sketch, "you know the Greeks are considered to be the most perfectly formed of any of the human race, and all their statues were modeled after a certain measure-plan, which you may not believe, but if you measure nine people out of ten you will find the measures pretty nearly correct. Now, I'll tell you about it if you want to hear."

"All right," said the reporter, sinking into a French chair with a Madonna painted on the back.

"Well, first off," began Mr. S., "the measurement from the tip of the middle fingers across from hand to hand when the arms are held horizontally should be exactly the same as the height of the person; the waist twice as far around as the neck; the neck twice as large as the wrist, and the wrist twice as large as the thumb. Then the face should be exactly as long as the hand, measuring from the wrist bone to the tip of the center finger. So you can find out if your hand is rightly proportioned. The face should be divided into three equal parts, one division coming to the eyebrows, and the second to the nostrils, and third to the end of the chin."

"But are all beautiful hands of the same width?"

"No. You know there are two kinds of hands, the soldier hand, which is shapely but broad, and the clerical hand, which is long and slender."

The Journalier sauntered into a chiropodist's on Fourteenth street to get his ideas on hands. "Finger nails," said he, "are the greatest give-away on people who pretend to true blood. In every case I can warrant you the hand is a strong index of character. Why, the electricity in people's hands is remarkable. Some ladies whose nails I beautify (for $1 you know), why, they send shocks right through me; regular electric batteries, I can tell you. But to come down to solid fact, a homely nail spoils the hand, no matter how beautiful it may be otherwise."

"What do you consider a perfect nail?" asked the reporter.

"Just this, sir. A long, oval-shaped nail, coming half way down between the top of the finger and the first joint; and to be cut properly the top end should be exactly the same shape as the upper part of the nail—a perfect oval; and it should grow no longer or no shorter than just to come to the tip of the finger."

"But I notice," said the reporter, "that many ladies and gentlemen wear their nails very long and cut to a narrow point."

"Barbarous, air, simply barbarous. If they only knew how much like bird's claws such nails looked they would stop it. But it is useless to fight against fashion. One might as well try to coax the sun to stop rising."

A prominent doctor in this city told the Journalier that a great many women, and men, too, poisoned themselves by using powder for their hands, or similar mixtures.

"The best thing in the world," said he, "and also the simplest for making the hands white, is Indian meal and glycerine. If the hands are washed in the meal twice a day and then glycerined, it is almost impossible for them not to be white and smooth."

A fashionable girl said to the Journalier: "You can say if you want to, and if you promise faithfully not to give even an idea of my name, that it is dangerous to let any one squeeze your hand too often or too hard, as it enlarges the knuckles more than you would imagine. Just look at my right hand. Now at this pretty left one."

The reporter was convinced.

What Women are Doing.

Other things being equal, an industrious woman can find profitable work to do as easily as an industrious man. In fact, no change of recent years is more noticeable than the enlargement of what used to be called "woman's sphere." The "sphere" is no longer merely the nursery and the school-room; but the whole globe, bless you. This increase is strikingly shown by a comparison of the last three censuses. In 1860 only 270,897 women and girls were employed in manufactures in the United States; in 1870 this number had become 323,770, and in 1880, 531,639. The manufacture of artificial feathers gives employment to more than 3,000 women, 4,000 are engaged in bookbinding, at which only 5,000 men are employed; 25,000 do work in shoe factories; 80,000 manufacture men's clothes, professionally, in addition to the millions who do this kind of work at their own homes. It is somewhat surprising that more women are engaged in making men's clothes for the market than in making women's clothes, the latter being only 22,000 in the United States; 2,000 women—and surely it is very proper—get a living by making confectionery; 1,400—as is also very proper—make twine; and 7,000 (which would surely be improper for men) are engaged in making corsets. The census shows that 217 make fireworks and explosives and 20 make gunpowder. The census must be believed, but this cannot be a tithe of the number thus engaged. Fifteen thousand women make their living canning fruit and vegetables, 17,000 make hosiery and 208 dress skins of other animals than their own "kids." One thousand one hundred and twenty confess that they get their living by making matches—sulphur and parlor matches. Indeed, are there any other kinds? Twenty-one make models and five times twenty-one pose as models. It is a consolation to know that not a woman in the country is engaged in the manufacture of castor oil. Nine hundred and eighty-six are photographers, sixty-five make pipes, fifteen are plumbers, 416 make pocketbooks and 416,000 empty them. Two thousand two hundred and eighty-one are reported to be elastic manufacturers, but the number of women who are elastic manufacturers is really many millions; 22,000 make our shirts and 10,000 manipulate our tobacco; yet there are women who pretend that smoking isn't nice. Three are engaged in the pump business, and eleven make refrigerators; 501 make rules and millions of 'em break rules. One woman makes scales, twenty-three make saws, 378 screws, and 301 starch.

The Marble Widow.

Alone in her marble palace lives the widow of A. T. Stewart. His remains, which are supposed to be resting beneath the magnificent mausoleum of the Garden City, are scarcely more secluded than is the personality of Mrs. Stewart. The greater portion of the Stewart mansion is closed, dust gathers upon its paintings and furniture, its blinds of white and gold shut out the exterior view, and save a small suite of rooms on the western corner the mansion is practically deserted. There is something touching in her splendid isolation within call of the fashion, care, elegance and bustling activity of a restless social world. A lady with silvery gray hair, whose features are still clearly cut and bear the evidence of refinement, is Mrs. Stewart. Her eyes are yet undimmed. She stoops slightly. She is of kindly presence, although her features bear the traces of much suffering, and a habitual sternness of expression settled upon her features when in repose. Her face, when lit up with the interest of a passing topic, affords the observer a fair idea of what Mrs. Stewart was in her prime. With the aid of a silver crutch-handled cane she can get about fairly. But there are times when the services of her personal attendant are much in request. Mrs. Stewart is a woman of method. When able she rises by 10 o'clock and breakfasts usually alone. Her tasks are few and modest, and her rich but simple breakfast equipage contains the old-fashioned meal of tea, dry toast and some light, easily digested food, as chicken or fish. Wines she rarely touches, save toward evening, preparatory to retirement, between 9 and 10 o'clock, when a glass of port acts as a gentle stimulant to a night of peaceful repose. But despite her long years of mourning, life has certain duties to be performed and a business tact inherited probably from her husband, is still characteristic of Mrs. Stewart's domestic habits. There are certain pensioners to be looked after, accounts of personal expenditures to be investigated, letters to be answered, and old friends to be received. Besides all these, her signature has to be obtained to sundry business formalities that are indispensable. All this takes up more time than would at first appear. One of her favorite pastimes, peculiar to many old people, is to indulge in the luxury of having her hair brushed. Her silver braids are long and fine, and though increasing years may have told upon her strength, time has added, rather than detracted from, the glory of her hair. This operation usually lasts for an hour or more, while her companion—sometimes it is a relative—reads from the newspaper or from a religious book, as her fancy may incline. Her moods are various and capricious. Ever-changing fancies are continually occurring to her mind. One day she may be bright, sanguine and exceedingly pleasant; the next day she may be plunged into utter despondency, and will refuse comfort from her most attached friends. When laboring under these morbid reflections she has been known to lie for hours upon her couch utterly alone. Her husband's portrait hangs in her bedroom, protected by a small curtain. She will look at it for an hour at a time, and then again the curtain will remain tightly drawn for days. Under some conditions her vitality is surprising, and her health, upon the whole, is good, considering the mental suffering she has undergone. Her palace is watched night and day, and to get to see Mrs. Stewart is one of the impossibilities to those who are not included among her warmest friends.

Furnishing a Summer Cottage.

New York Post: "Mrs. M. B." wishes some hints in regard to the furnishing of a summer cottage. For my part, I like something on the floor, even of the humblest room. Matting looks so cool, and is so easily kept perfectly sweet and clean, that it is preferable to anything else; but it is open to the objection that muddy footprints show for "all they are worth" (to be explicit rather than elegant), and must be immediately cleaned, and this ought to be done with hot water, with a little salt in it. A rug that will cover the center of the room, and so give an air of home, on a rainy day may be substituted. It is a wise precaution to provide one's self with an abundance of cushions. Then seats may be improvised almost anywhere at will. These cushions may be covered as simply as possible, with cretonne or Turkey-red calico, or with coarse worsted goods. If they are made like pillow-cases, so that they can be removed and dried if they are damp, it will be found worth while. As for the decoration of the cottage, this may be safely left for the younger members of the party, if there are younger members; grasses, ferns and curious objects found in the woods may relieve walls of a barren look. Tack a large sheet of white paper or cardboard to the wall; on this put with pins the lovely moths and strange insects which abound. They must first be chloroformed or treated with benzine, and have death made easy. The want of a good bed often drives the summer pilgrim home, and if your retreat is accessible and it is possible to do so, by all means take with you a good bed. It is not at all necessary that you should have a bedstead. The springs or the wire mattresses may be placed on the floor or may be arranged with pieces of board so that they will answer an excellent purpose. A cottage does not look habitable unless it has something at the windows. Curtains of cheesecloth are certainly inexpensive, but it is not necessary that all the windows be neatly curtained. Lambrequins may be improvised from old muslin dresses or slips of lace or of cretonne. These may be made straight across the bottom and be trimmed or cut in points or scallops. The table in the sitting room, which may be of an unpainted pine board, ought to have a spread. Make this of scarlet Turkish towelling, or of drab; cut the edge in scallops and bind with braid; or you may possibly find a remnant at the store of some pretty scarlet worsted goods of bright color, but inexpensive material. Then a few books should be taken, more to be looked at than to be read, though one might be pardoned even in the mountains for dipping into such books as Hazlitt's Table Talk or Essays of Elia. By all means follow Thoreau's example and throw away anything that demands dusting—that is, much dusting. The less care of that kind one can have the better, and I have no doubt that lives are prolonged as well as sweetened by these summer outings.

Benefits of Equestrianism.

During a brief suburban visit recently, it was a pleasure to see half-a-score of young ladies, in company with as many gentlemen, enjoying the healthful exercise of riding on horseback. It was a reminder that a practice long in vogue—whether from necessity or choice it matters not—might be revived with good results both as regards health and enjoyment to all who have time and opportunity to avail themselves of it. In "ye olden times" it was no rare sight to see maiden or wife sitting on a pillion behind lover, or brother, or husband on the way to church or market town, or making friendly visits, and in later times young ladies in country towns and villages were accustomed, attended or alone, to "mount and away," whether for business or in search of healthful enjoyment, and the rosy cheeks which were likely to come of it. The horses on this occasion were moving along the smooth, well-kept road in what is called a "lope," or easy-going canter, and the riders seemed much at their ease and in no fear of being roughly shaken up, as a rider sometimes most provokingly and most ludicrously is when seated on a horse whose high-stepping trot renders the exercise anything but a pleasurable pastime. If American women lack the grace and comeliness of figure of their English cousins—as we have recently been told by an English lady who ought to know—horseback riding, and more frequent walks for the sake of practice and improvement, may help to mollify or correct the inequality in this respect. The broad, flat feet of our kinswomen across the sea is a point against us in the matter of pedestrian execution and excellence; and they have no doubt profited by the advice of Charles Reade, who in his Simpleton gives some sensible hints concerning the gait and carriage of English women, which may be profitably read on this side the water, by the best-dressed women in the world.

Modernizing Old Dresses.

An excellent way to remodel and modernize an old silk dress, black or light-colored, is to take all the old trimmings off the skirt and bodice, leaving it perfectly plain. If there is enough material and sufficient ingenuity to form the old shape of the waist and breadths of the skirt into a plain princesse slip, the way is then clear. Trim the skirt with flounces of Oriental lace, which now comes in beautiful designs at remarkably low prices. If there is sufficient goods to make an alternate ruffle or fan pleating of the silk, it will make all the less lace to buy. If the silk is black, Spanish lace can be purchased for as reasonable a sum as the Oriental. For the overdress, place over the silk skirt paniers made of Oriental net, edged with a fall of the lace. The drapery in the back may be of the untrimmed net alone, or may match the trimmed paniers. If the silk of the bodice is in good condition, a bertha of the net, finished with double frills of the lace, will elegantly complete the trimming. If not, cut the bodice out half low in the neck, the sleeves short, and veil the arms and neck with the net; knots of gay-colored ribbon, or sprays of flowers and foliage, will then complete the magical effect of the renovation. Thus can be had a very dressy, a very tasteful, and an exceedingly fashionable toilet, which can be obtained at a moderate expense from a dress which even your great-grandmother wore.

Foibles of Fashion.

Many of the newly imported polonaises are cut with casement or heart-shaped bodices, or in graduated Vandykes, the largest reaching from the throat to the belt in front. Underneath this opening is set an embroidered plastron of satin or velvet, and sometimes it is covered with applique work in silk and jet. A handsome model of this kind is made of black satin-finish gros grain of magnificent quality, the plastron underneath the pointed opening being covered with rich embroidery in Byzantine designs, and the edges of the V on either side ornamented with jet-beaded applique bands, which, extending below the waist for some inches, are turned in a sharp point and carried back, covering the line where the paniers are gauged to the bodice. The panels on the sides of the trained skirt are elaborately trimmed with the embroidery and applique work, the latter running through the center of the panel.

A pretty and serviceable fabric for adorning summer dresses of white organdie, French muslin, and the like, is a new very sheer cambric, with a solid embroidery covering its entire surface from selvage to selvage, the embroidery being done in exquisite Swiss, Venetian, old Flemish and Irish point patterns. This material will be used for jersey-cut bodices to be attached to skirts covered with ruffles embroidered in a pattern to correspond, the joining of skirt and bodice being concealed by a sash drapery of extremely wide moire or satin ribbon. Children's entire costumes will be made of this elegant material.

Among the most costly fabrics for summer evening toilets are zephyr brocades and brocatelles, with brilliantly colored exotics on dark grounds; magnificent Indian tissues, woven with threads of gold or silver; heavy ottomans in all the new artistic shades; lampas, with satin stripes figured with velvet flowers, and damasks, with huge single flowers or bouquets in clusters, raised on sheeny satin grounds of primrose, pineapple, cinnamon and golden brown, tea-rose, shrimp-pink, cameo, mauve and endless shades of green.

Summer mantles offer but little variety in shape from those of last season; they are demi-pelisse visite, and mantelette or scarf mantle. Some of the most expensive wraps are made of brocaded gauze velvet, or of brocaded Sicilienne gauze, finished with marabout fringes, elegant passementeries, chenille bands, or with beaded embroidery, lace, and satin bows. There are many very beautiful wraps for young ladies, in graceful shapes, and made of white lace, white or tinted cestle velvet, lined with pale-colored surahs and trimmed with pearl fringes, costing $25 a yard.

A glance at a throng of ladies at a fashionable evening party will show how very largely rich colored jackets are still worn over skirts of lace tulle, veiling, and other light fabrics. The skirts are invariably short when worn with these jackets, and are also very bouffant. The most approved shape for the spencer is that known as the Newmarket, but unlike the Newmarket proper, it is cut with elbow sleeves, and usually fashioned heart-shape in the neck. Embossed velvet, plain Lyons velvet, heavy satin brocade, or rich Oriental embossed materials are all appropriate.

Many of the new parasols of silk and satin are lined with Watteau-patterned foulards, with lace arranged on the outside in fan-pleatings. These are especially designed for garden party use, coaching, and like occasions, and not for the promenade. Other styles are of broche satin, edged with marabout, and all are large and coup-shape, with the flaps on each gore arranged in the same way as last year.

Gold basket-straw bonnets, trimmed with flame-colored lace and fancy silver straws and velvet intermingled, are the newest fancies in French millinery.

Household Hints.

"I well tell you," said a neighbor, "of something that makes an agreeable filling for a shortcake. You will not believe it until you try it, but for those unfortunate ones to whom the acid of the strawberry is as a poison it cannot be too highly recommended." Take some nice dried apples, wash, and soak, and cook them until they are tender; then rub them through a sieve or a fine colander, add sugar and the grated rind and the juice of a lemon; then make a shortcake in the ordinary manner and use this in place of the berries.

Cornstarch blanc-mange may be varied almost indefinitely by adding fruit to it. Stir the fruit in after the pudding is cooked and is just ready to be poured in the molds. It is delicious also with chocolate in; where you use four tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, use two of chocolate; pour in teacups which you have first wet with cold water. A nice sauce for this is made by beating one egg and adding milk and sugar to your taste; a very little vanilla improves it, and still does not disguise the chocolate flavor.

A noted caterer tells this story: If green peas are shelled and then put in dry, open-mouthed bottles, and are shaken together so as to occupy as little space as possible, then are corked tightly and are sealed, they will keep three or four months. They must, however, be buried in dry earth in the cellar. This is certainly worth trying.

If the paper which is put over jelly and jam is wet in the white of an egg, it will when dry be tight and firm, and keep the fruit from molding with much more certainty than if it is dipped in alcohol or brandy. The paper which is laid next the fruit is meant, not that which is tied or pasted over the glass.

Dandelion greens may be cooked and served like spinach, and are not only appetizing as a side dish, but possess virtues which make good health. If a small slice of bacon is boiled with them, the flavor is improved. A little vinegar will relieve it of any suspicion of greasiness which the bacon may give it.

A delicious salad is made by boiling new beets without scraping them. When they are tender, drop them in cold water, remove the skin, slice them and put in a salad dish in layers with slices of hard-boiled eggs; season with pepper and salt, a little butter and vinegar.

A pretty way to arrange a large and handsome Christmas card so that it may hang on the wall is to sew with very short stitches a border of large chenille around it; tassels may be added, if you choose, to the lower corners.

The seat of a divan or small sofa may be prettily covered by putting a long tidy of antique lace over it.

A ROMANCE.

Bird, in thy lonely nest,
Fluttering often with a strange unrest,
Why sing no song? Why entertain no guest?
O say? dost thou await
The coming of a heav'n-appointed mate,
While visions haunt that heart so desolate?

Though love with fitful gleams
Doth light thee through the happy land of dreams,
When thou awakest, dark thy future seems;
Yet all the woods around
With wooing melodies of birds resound,
Answer, sweet voice! none sweeter can be found.

Nay, if to charm thine eyes
Love come not suddenly—a glad surprise—
There is no hope for thee beneath the skies.
Life must this rapture bring,
Or thou wilt hide thy head and droop thy wing
And die, e'er thou hast ever learned to sing!

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

Congress having reduced the appropriations for the next fiscal year, immediate discontinuance of the following named signal service stations is made necessary and ordered: Eagle Pass, Tex.; Eagle Rock, Idaho; Keogh Fort, Mont.; Missoula Fort, Mont.; Pioche, Nev.; Puntarassa, Fla.; Rochester, N. Y.; San Antonio, Tex.; Santa Fe, N. M.; Springfield, Mo.; Tuscon, Ariz.; Visalia, Colo.; Washakie Fort, Wyo.; Winnemucca, Nev.; Sandusky, Ohio, is re-established as a station of the first-class. The following named stations of the third-class will hereafter be maintained as stations of the first-class; Custer City, Mont.; Rio Grande City, Tex.

Comment on the star route verdict is still rife in Washington. There is, generally speaking, no fault found with the jury. It appears from a poll of the jury but four of them are republican and eight are democrats. They are all considered honest men by their neighbors, and incorruptible. The real difficulty was in the indictment for conspiracy. As was pointed out a year ago, before the first trial, a conviction for conspiracy had never been obtained in this district.

The special agent sent to investigate the alleged smuggling of Chinese laborers into British Columbia, in his report to Secretary Folger places the number at 10,000, chiefly employed by the Canadian Pacific. The agent says it is not likely they were ever in this country, and claims that no Chinese from British Columbia have entered Washington Territory without production of proof of previous residence in the United States.

Judge James, in the case of J. G. Rigelow against Bettie Mason, to restrain the payment of the "Betty and baby" fund, and for a decree making Bieglow an allowance for his services as counsel, signed an order, dismissing the bill on condition of the payment of $400 to Bigelow for his expense in defending Sergeant Mason on his trial for shooting at Guiteau.

The secretary of the treasury gives notice that exchanges of 3½ per cent. bonds into 3 per cents will not be made during July next, the books of these two loans being closed for the preparation of the August first dividend. Continued bonds received for exchange during July will be exchanged upon reopening the books interest at 3½ per cent. remaining to that date.

It is understood that the president and Secretary Folger have practically hit upon a scheme for the consolidation of the internal revenue districts. The details are not yet ready for announcement. In the main, it is believed that the plan is identical with that proposed by the bureau and published some weeks ago.

Postmasters commissioned: Mils Kundxson, Oslo, Wis.; Rasmus Signalui, Blue Mound, Minn., Charles A. French, Mara, Dak.; Frank Aldricn, Waneta, Dak.

The president has appointed Albert Woodcock of Illinois as United States consul to Catalonia, Italy.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

G. K. Barnes, general passenger agent of the Northern Pacific, in response to various inquiries, has issued a circular letter, setting forth that the road is completed to Helena, Mont., 1,154 miles from St. Paul, and that at Helena there is a daily line of stages crossing a gap in the road of 150 miles; that the work of completing the road is progressing rapidly, and the indications are that it will be finished by the last of August, and through trains then be running between St. Paul and Portland.

A meeting of the citizens of Dubuque was held recently for the purpose of inaugurating the projected railroad from this city to some indefinite point in the west. Many of the leading capitalists of the city were present and great enthusiasm was shown. It is prepared to run the road up the valley of Wapriepriour, and from thence Northwest.

Chief Engineer Blunt says that new steel rail has been laid on the Winona & St. Peter railroad between Sleepy eye and Tracy.

GENERAL NEWS NOTES.

A meeting of the Marshall, Lyon county, Minnesota board of trade was held last week for the purpose of endeavoring to secure direct rail communication with St. Paul and Minneapolis. Marshall is but 140 miles from St. Paul, yet passage and traffic between these points must be made over the lines of railroad with a transfer of both freight and passengers. The former is compelled to stop over night en route either way. A merchant of Marshall or of any prominent town of the southwestern counties of the state can go to Chicago, transact business and return as quickly as the trip can be made to Minneapolis or St. Paul. The former distance is 552, and the latter but 140. Freight ordinarily can be secured from Chicago quicker, and at as low rates. Two roads, the Milwaukee and Albert Lea route now run within 35 miles of Marshall, and it was for the purpose of having one of these extend its line to Marshall that the recent meeting was held.

William Simms, secretary of the Kansas state board of agriculture, says of the wheat crop of his state in the advance sheet of his report: "Of the total area of the state 12 per cent. will not be harvested. The estimated yield for this year will be seventeen bushels per acre, which will make a total production of both winter and spring wheat for the state of 23,601,594 bushels—a decrease from last year of 12,133,252 bushels, and 1,400,000 bushels under Talmage's estimate of the state made June 1." Secretary Sims also makes an estimate on the probable crop of the United States for 1883, taken from the departments of other states, in which he places the total production at 385,000,000 bushels, 8,000,000 below the late estimate made by Tallmage, and shows a shortage of 23 per cent. or 115,000,000 bushels from last year.

An unpleasant scandal has become public at Racine, Wis., the outgrowth of the alleged relations existing between C. W. Forrest, the agent of the American Express company, and a very pretty widow, finally resulting in the forced resignation of the former. The subject has created quite a sensation, as Mr. Forrest has been agent for the company over eighteen years, and all parties moved in good society.

Last Saturday the legatees under Amasa Stone's will were paid. The legatees found that one or two of Mr. Stone's relatives, and ones to whom he was especially partial, had been forgotten in his will. A meeting was called, the matter talked over, and it was finally agreed that every one should set aside some portion of his or her bequest and thus make up an equal amount for those not provided for.

The value of exports of provisions, tallow and dairy products for May was $285,415; for five months ended May 31, $43,838,604; provisions and tallow for seven months ended May 31, $58,694,975. The value of exports of of the same products for the corresponding period last year was $378,550 in excess of the above figures.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

Five hundred masked men visited the jail at Sheboygan, Mich., on the 14th., overpowered the sheriff, took Till Warner, the supposed ravisher of the young girl, Nettie Lyons, to a point just outside of the town, and hanged him to the cross ties of the railroad viaduct. The girl had identified him. The victim was cut down after a lapse of two hours. He protested his innocence to the last. He was let down once before he died, but would not confess.

H. W. Sprague, the elevator incendiary, has been taken from Buxton, Dak., to Caledonia, where he was lodged in jail, and will probably be safe from the hands of the mob. Last spring he induced John Little of Buxton to make an assignment to him, by false representations. He afterwerd failed in business; has repeatedly threatened to clean out the town and destroy certain ones in it. He has not found bail yet.

At 2:30 o' clock Thursday morning the citizens of Iron River, a Michigan mining and lumbering town, twenty-seven miles northwest of Florence, N Y., were startled by a fearful concussion. A shot of giant powder had been placed under the southeast corner of a building owned by Mrs. Hannon, and had shattered the whole front of the structure and broke glass 1,000 feet away.

Frank Lincoln and William Vickers quarreled at Frenchman's ranche, on the Stinking Water, Mont. After fighting for some time, in which Vickers was worsted, the latter went out and procured a gun, with which he shot and killed Lincoln. Vickers left the county before the sheriff could be communicated with.

A. P. Adams, a wealthy ranchman of Red Cloud, Neb., who has been sued in Omaha for $10,000 damages by Stewart Hoge, for the alienation of his wife's affections, declares he is innocent and was not in Omaha on the day specified by Mrs. Hoge, and has not been in Omaha for three years. Some people think it is blackmail.

John Williams, aged seventy-seven, was turned out of the Little Rock penitentiary recently. In 1861 he was convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life. The longest punishment allowed by the statutes for that offense is twenty-one years.

Robert Lee, the defaulting postmaster of Driscoll, Ala., who unlawfully dealt in stamps, forged thirteen names to his bond for $20,000, and also the justice's signature and seal. He is charged with three murders in Mississippi.

Investigation shows that by paying a bribe to certain alderman of $1,500 Mrs. Brayley sold the city of Buffalo a site for a school for $19,000, which she had previously offered for $16,500.

At Hastings, Neb., John Babcock, indicted for murder, pleaded guilty to manslaughter and was sentenced to ten years in prison.

D. C. Freeman, who has been representing Lindblom & Co., of Chicago, in Louisville, has disappeared, owing $10,000.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

Gen. Grant in an interview said: I think the courts are constituted to try cases, and a jury was obtained to try that case. In this particular case the prisoners were tried by the newspapers in advance and they no doubt influenced public judgment without the testimony being heard. They made their own testimony in the beginning. Now that the testimony has all been in and weeks have been spent in expounding the law and the evidence in the case, I don't see but what the public is bound to accept the judgment rendered.

Bishop Spalding corroborates the statement that the archbishops of the United States has been commanded to assemble at Rome next October to arrange a plan for a plenary council to be held in America. The business of the council will only pertain to the offices of this country, and not involve Irish affairs. It is three months since Bishop Spalding left Rome, and that was the pontifical intention at the time of his departure.

Norman L. Munro, the publisher, has sued James Gordon Bennett for $10,000 damages done by the appearance of personals in the Herald signed "Sadie." Bennett has been warned not to publish the writing and had promised not to do so. The result of the publication has been the alienation of Mrs. Munro's affection, the breaking up of Munro's home, and the general injury of his business.

It is reported that Senator Tabor, in ignorance of the elaborate routine by which alone money can be legally paid out of the United States treasury, recently drew directly on Secretary Folger for $65,000, the price of land which he sold to the government for the new postoffice and custom house at Denver, and deposited the draft with a Colorado bank for collection.

Frank Kernan, son of the New York ex-senator, who was with Gen. Sherman's son at Georgetown college, and, like him, chose to enter the Catholic priesthood, has, after four years study, decided that the priesthood, is not his vocation, and has given it up and returned to Utica.

Prescott Bros. & Co., the largest and oldest hardware dealers of Fort Wayne, Ind., have made an assignment in favor of George H. Wilson for the benefit of preferred creditors representing claims to the amount of $50,000. Liabilties, $90,000; assets $100,000.

In literary matters it is announced that Mr. Froude, the historian, is preparing a study of Martin Luther. Macmillan announces Arthur Hardy's novel, But Yet a Woman; Richard Grant White's edition of Shakespeare will appear here next month.

Capt. Winfield S. Edgerly, Seventh cavalry, who recently secured his captaincy by the appointment of Capt. M. V. Sheridan to be assistant adjutant general, has been granted twenty day's leave of absence from the recruiting station at Cincinnati.

William H. Vanderbilt recently drove Maud S and Aldine over the track of the Gentlemen's Driving park in 2:15½, lowering the record of 2:16¾ made by Frank Work's team, Edward and Swiveller, at Morrisania, N. Y., July 13, 1882.

Zebina Eastman, who died in Chicago on the 15th, was one of the Owen Lovejoy sort of anti-slavery leaders in Illinois, and Lovejoy's death brought him out in the slavery question. He published numerous papers.

Annie Crandell of New Baltimore, M. Y., caught a summer boarder last summer who promised to marry her, but in January he married another. The jury gave Annie $15,000.

H. Dukes, who was killed by young Nutt, was buried on Saturday at Uniontown, Pa.

FOREIGN NEWS GOSSIP.

Lord Carlingford, minister of agriculture, received an influential deputation representing towns in England claiming 10,000,000 people, the object of which was to protest against the restrictions of food supply. Carlingford stated the decrease in the importation of American cattle was due to the fact that better prices were obtained in America, and not to the system of compulsory slaughter at British ports. He said the government would continue to act up to the spirit of the present laws, and not strain them in the direction of further prohibition, as urged by the opponents to the importion of American cattle.

Admiral Pierre, commander of the French fleet in Madagascar waters, in his report of the bombardment of Magurguayoray on the 6th of May, says he demanded the surrender of the place, but received an evasive reply. Five vessels opened fire on the town and the three forts, mounting thirty guns, were quickly silenced. The Hova quarter of the town was destroyed, but the French factory and most of the American houses escaped injury. The garrison of 2,000 men retreated. The French sustained no loss of men. They occupied the town and are collecting customs.

Great excitement has been caused at Cairo on account of the conversion of a young Mohammedan by American missionaries. Arab fanatics attempted to maltreat the convert, but the British consul, Malet, protected him. He will be sent to Cyprus for safety.

London Truth says that the queen has recovered from the injury to her knee. The depression of her spirits is said, however, to cause some anxiety, owing to the influence it will have on her general health. It is her intention to leave for Scotland on the 20th.

At Innsbruck, Austria, recently the trial for high treason of Sabidini, who drove Overdank, the bomb manufacturer, across the frontier, was begun.

THE CASUALTY RECORD.

The total losses by last week's cyclone at Beloit are about $60,000. The heaviest losses were Benjamin Brown, on building, $1,500; Bart & Bailey, dry goods stock, from $1,500 to $2,500; H. J. Smith, book and jewelry store, $1,000 to 1,500; Frank Travers, clothier, $1,000; Bamlin & Race, building and stock, $800; D. S. Foster, building and bookstore, $1,000; Rock River Paper company on mill, $1,000 to $1,200; F. S. Fenten's drug store $1,000. Very many have losses to the extent of from $1,000 to $1,500.

An earthquake at Ecquador on the 10th of May caused great alarm at Quito. People camped in the streets, fearing cataclysm. In Latacurga the shock was very severe, overthrowing several houses. Those remaining threatening to fall. On the diligence arriving at Latacurga the mules were taken out and it was pulled through the streets by men, for fear its rumbling would shake down the houses. Cotopaxi was in active eruption. People in the vicinity fear a repetition of March 1867.

Henry F. Crane, traveling salesman for the Jewell Belting company, Hartford, Conn., was found dead in bed at the Pacific House, Council Bluffs, recently. He left a note stating that he had taken poison. No cause is given for the act.

Gray's Opera house Boston, was burned recently. E. H. Gray, proprietor of the opera house, says every one in the building escaped. There was but little confusion, and no one hurt. Loss $100,000.

August Pinsky of Waconia was fatally injured by being run into by a train, throwing him from his wagon and across the rails.

The entire town of Pottery, in Calhoun county, was burned Saturday.

JUSTICE INSULTED.

The Star Route Jurors Come in With the Surprising Verdict of Not Guilty.

"You can ask the jury whether they have any communication to make to the court," said Judge Wylie to the crier when the criminal court at Washington hearing the star route case reassembled the 15th. Crier Donaldson soon returned with a message that the jury desired to communicate with the court. They filed into the court room, apparently none the worse for their continement. When they were seated Judge Wylie said: "Gentlemen of the jury, the court has sent for you for the purpose of inquiring whether you have any communication to make." The foreman in reply stated that the jury had agreed upon a verdict, and a painful silence fell upon the court room, only to be broken by wild shouts of applause, when in a clear-toned voice the foreman stated the verdict was "not guilty." Immediately the decorum of the court of justice was forgotton, and the cheers resounded from all quarters of the crowded room.

Judge Wylie sat dignified, but apparently dazed by the announcement of the foreman, since he made no effort to check the tumult about him. For a few minutes the noise was so great as to render it impossible for anything like orderly proceedings. Many of the adherents of the defense were present, and the discharge of the jury was the signal of a rush of congratulating spectators. Mrs. Dorsey, Mrs. Peck and the Misses Ricker, after standing on chairs and screaming, laughing and sobbing alternately, somehow got out of the crowd and organized an impromtu camp meeting in the nearest corridor. They sang, cried, laughed like demented beings.

In the ante-rooms and halls the jury was beset by a throng of interested persons, prominent among them being the defendants and Mrs. S. W. Dorsey and Mrs. Peck, who thanked them for the verdict with tears in their eyes. As the foreman reached the sidewalk a large crowd assembled there burst into tumultuous cheers, which were renewed as each juror made his way out of the court house.

The crowd then poured pell-mell into the street, still shouting, and ran across the street to "the hole in the wall." Up stairs sat Dorsey. Calling to the proprietor he ordered free entertainment, solid and liquid, and in a very short time a scene of enthusiasm and excitement followed. Meanwhile Mrs. Dorsey and two or three other ladies got up stairs, and having exhausted their lungs fell to kissing. Ingersoll cried, Miner sobbed, Valle fairly blubbered, and taking all in all a right round quantity of tears was shed in and about the court house. In the afternoon the defendants enjoyed an ovation wherever they went.

There is talk of pushing the other indictments and bringing civil suits, but it will probably amount to nothing. Dorsey talks of suing all the newspapers that have called him a thief. The press and the people generally accept the result as inevitable without much indignation or curiosity. A few regard it as a vindication of the purity of the star route martyrs. The general drift of opinion, however, is that the administration of justice in Washington is as rotten as the administration of the post office department under Brady.

The Graduates at West Point.

Following is the list of graduates at West Point, with their standing:

1, George A. Zinn, Pennsylvania; 2, William C. Langfitt, Ohio; 3, Henry E. Waterman, Minnesota; 4, William F. Hancock, Ohio; 5, Henry C. Davis, Jr., South Carolina; 6, Beverly W. Dunn, Louisiana; 7, Samuel D. Freeman, North Carolina; 8, William F. Flynn, Connecticut; 9, Robert J. Duff, Michigan; 10, Thomas Ridgway, New York; 11, John W. Ruckman, Illinois; 12, Alfred B. Jackson, Massachusetts; 13, William P. Stone, Arkansas; 14, William E. Shipp, North Carolina; 15, Ira A. Haynes, Kentucky; 16, Willoughby Walke Virginia; 17, Edwin C. MINNESOTA'S CAPITAL.

Growth of St. Paul—Its Remarkable Prosperity—Increase of Population and Business.

General John B. Sanborn, president of the St. Paul Chamber of Commerce, delivered his annual address before that body a few days ago, in which are found the following facts and figures of interest to the citizens of the state at large:

THE CITY'S GROWTH.

The past year has been one of unusual growth, prosperity and development in all parts of the country. In this city the hopes of the most sanguine have been more than realized. Our population has reached a number between 90,000 and 100,000, estimated from all data at our command. The enrollment of the children for our schools, which, in 1880, when by the federal census we had 43,000 people, was 4,338, now reaches 8,750. The number of employes in our manufacturing establishments was in 1880, 6,029; the number now employed is 12,267. The number of employes in the wholesale trade in 1880 did not exceed 2,000, while in 1882 the number was 4,684, and now exceeds 5,000. The assessed valuation of property in the city, which in 1880 was, for personal property, $8,827,753, and real estate $21,040,634, and in 1882 was, for personal property, $10,040,539, and real estate $30,454,499, has now reached, at a fair valuation, fully $60,000,000. The amount of business done through the postoffice has more than doubled since 1880. So the rule may be applied to any or every branch of business, and the same result is obtained, viz.: that the volume of business and the number of persons employed in it has more than doubled since the census of 1880.

TRADE AND BANKING.

The increase in the wholesale trade of 1882 over 1881 is $20,372,495, for the full details of which you are referred to the annual report now ready for distribution. While all branches of business show a wonderful increase, that of the wholesale grocery trade is most striking. From 1848 to 1881, this trade had grown to $6,350,000 for the latter year, but in the single year of 1882, it leaped forward to $13,533,000, thus gaining more in a single year than in the preceding thirty years. The lumber trade in 1881 had reached $1,348,000, but in 1882 this trade also sprang forward to $3,439,622, gaining more in one year than in all our previous existence. This vast increase in the volume of business required more banking capital and greater facilities for its transaction: and the capital of our national banks, which was $2,200,000 in 1882, has been increased to $1,700,000, with a surplus of $870,431, making an aggregate of $5,570,431. This exceeds by $1,402,979 the capital stock and surplus of all the other national banks of the State of Minnesota, as appears by the report of the controller of the currency for 1882.

After giving a statement showing the aggregate of the capital stock and surplus of each of the national banks in the State outside of St. Paul, the total amount being $4,167,452.71, Gen. Sanborn continued:

The capital of the state banks in the city which in 1881 was $300,000, has now been increased to $700,000, making the aggregate banking capital of the city at this time $6,270,431. There are in Minnesota twenty-four banks, organized under the State laws, with a capital stock of $2,333,750, of which amount the banks in St. Paul have $700,000, which leaves for other banks $1,633,750, which added to the entire amount of stock and surplus of national banks outside the city, which is $4,167,452.71, makes $5,801,202.71, or $469,228 less than the stock of the St. Paul banks. This amount would seem sufficient to transact all legitimate business upon safe and prudent business principles.

NATHAN FORD'S ENTERPRISE.

Knabe by Telephone.

Several hundred of the prominent citizens of St. Paul had the unusual privilege of listening to the musical treat afforded by Mr. Titcomb's recital last Thursday evening through the telephone. The piano warerooms of Nathan Ford, at 97 East Third street, were connected by telephone with sixty-five residences in different parts of the city. The eagerness of those who received invitations to this telephonic treat to insure connection in time, showed their appreciation of the labor and enterprise of those having the matter in charge. Their assurance that the magnificent tones of the Knabe pianos retained their richness notwithstanding the many miles of metallic circuit, add another to the many laurels won by the Knabe this season.

Truly marvelous are the wonders of electricity, and the privileges conferred by its use multiply daily. It now becomes possible not only to order Knabe pianos by telegraph but to listen to their tones at a distance of miles by telephone. Intending purchasers of "the best pianos made" can hereafter "ring for connection" with Mr. Ford's music store and select their pianos and order them sent to their residences without stepping outside their doors, for electricity in tones, like sunlight in photography, tells the truth.

Mr. Ford is to be congratulated on this latest enterprise of his, and the gratitude of the citizens of the northwest is daily manifesting itself by their actions.

John Bright on American Affairs.

Right Hon. John Bright delivered an address at Bingley hall Birmingham, before an audience of over 20,000 persons. More than 150 addresses of congratulation from various liberal associations were presented him. Great enthusiasm prevailed. Mr. Bright reviewed the events of the last fifty years, and laid stress upon the enormous advantages conferred upon the country by the repeal of the corn laws. Referring to America, Bright said:

Permit me to address a word to the artisian classes of the United States. I am no enemy of the United States. I fought her battles in this country. [Cheers] I sympathise with her as much now as then, almost as much as if born upon her soil. I believe that the question in the United States between a protective and simply revenue tariff is nearing its solution. The opinion is growing that irresistable economic facts are offering themselves for consideration of statesmen, and every intelligent man in the great republic. An extraordinary condition of things exist there, No country of any age ever experienced or dreamed an actual surplus revenue of £30-000 sterling. This fact is fatal to the high protection party. The government does not well know what to do with it.

After an eloquent allusion to the war which abolished slavery, Mr. Bright said: I believe that the next election for president will be fought on trade lines. The great people of the United States will declare it to be the inalienable right of every American citizen to spend his money in the world's cheapest markets.

A Celebration Dampened.

At the ceremonies attending the dedication of a soldiers' monument at Mystic, while a salute was being fired in honor of the governor, by a battery of artillery from Fort Trumbull, the Williams and Sedgewick posts of the G. A. R., passing at the time, received two guns in their ranks. The first discharge was received by the Williams post, and the second by Sedgewick post. Eighteen men were injured, but none fatally, except Lieut. William Carruthers, assistant postmaster at Norwich. Commander J. C. Brewer, of Sedgewick post, Norwich, was seriously hurt.

A Ravisher in Great Peril.

Cheboygan, Mich., Special.—Till Warren, an Alpena man, was arrested last evening between here and Mackinaw City, as the ravisher of Nettie Lyon, and brought to this city and examined by physicians, and identified by others as the fiend. Serious trouble was anticipated as the infuriated crowd gathered about hooting and yelling to lynch him. He was assaulted while in charge of the officers on the way to the county jail under a strong guard, but was not hurt. He was placed in jail and a powerful guard took charge. The crowd prowled around the jail most of the night, but were dispersed by the officers.

HIS FATHER'S MURDERER.

Capt. Nutt's Murder and his Daughter's Shame Avenged in the Blood of the Wretched Dukes.

Uniontown, Pa. June 13.—James Nutt, son of State Treasurer Capt. A. C. Nutt, deceased, shot and killed N. L. Dukes, his father's murderer, this evening at 7:30 o'clock. He shot four times, all the shots taking effect. Dukes died instantly. Dukes had been frequently informed of his danger in remaining in Uniontown, and he lately said he would either stay there or the cemetery. It is said that he had expressed fear of the son of Capt. Nutt, and was never on the street after night. To-day James Nutt was seen practicing with a revolver at his home, and this evening about 7:30 o'clock he was standing near the postoffice, when Dukes came along. As Dukes was passing he turned his head and noticed young Nutt just as he stepped from the doorway, and fired a shot, taking effect in Dukes' side. Dukes started to run, when Nutt followed and shot again. By this time Dukes was on the postoffice steps, when he received another shot and fell inside the door. Nutt followed and fired two more shots into Dukes' prostrate body, one taking effect in the neck. Dukes was dead before any one could get to him. The revolver that did the work is the same that Capt. Nutt carried on the morning of his death. Young Nutt gave himself up and is now in jail. He was calm, but pale as a sheet. Five shots were fired, four taking effect. The coroners jury are now sitting. Excitement is running high.

THE PENALTY OF WARNING UNHEEDED.

Dukes had been frequently warned to leave Uniontown, but he persistently refused. His friends had often advised him to seek another home, and his answer was always that he would either live in Uniontown or be a corpse in the cemetery. As far back as last December, young Nutt had threatened to have Dukes life, and the latter had always avoided him. The last of the two shots fired after Dukes fell, penetrated his back. The shooting created intense excitement, but at 11 p. m. everything was quiet. Young Nutt is not quite twenty years of age and has always been considered quiet and inoffensive. It is said, however, that he has been practicing with a revolver for some time past.

On Dec. 23, 1882, N. L. Dukes, a lawyer, and member-elect of the Pennsylvania legislature from Fayette county, shot and killed Capt. A. C. Nutt, state cashier, in the Jennings house, Uniontown. The cause was the alleged seduction of Capt. Nutt's daughter Lizzie by Dukes, to whom the young lady was engaged. The jury much to the astonishment of the public, and in the face of the most conclusive evidence of the guilt of Dukes, and the judge's charge, which was strongly in favor of the prosecution, rendered a verdict of not guilty.

A Bad Priest Sent to Jail.

New York Special: A slender and prepossessing girl eighteen years old stood before the clerk's desk in Justice Nacher's court in Williamsburg Friday, and a stalwart young man stood beside her.

"This girl," said the young man, "is my wife's sister. She has suffered outrageous treatment at the hands of the Rev. Florence McCarthy, a priest of the church to which I belong, and she wishes to prefer a charge against him."

The girl said in her complaint that soon after she entered Father McCarthy's service he committed an assault upon her. Nothing improper occurred between them after that till last Friday, when she went to Father McCarthy's house and the priest made an insulting proposition to her. She resented it, but Father McCarthy, she alleges, after a long struggle, assaulted her and afterward locked her in a room. The girl swore that she threatened to expose the priest, and that he replied, "You had better not; you will bring more trouble upon yourself than you can bring upon me." The girl also alleges that Father McCarthy attempted to assault her last Monday. She told her story to Bishop Laughlin, and the latter remarking that there had been too many complaints of the kind against Father McCarthy and said that he would suspend him. The priest was sent to jail and subsequently admitted to bail.

Stories of the New Bishop.

New York Tribune: Dr. Knickerbacker, of Minneapolis, Minn., the bishop-elect (P. E.) of Indiana, is described as a man of unusual energy and tact. In his own church he has a surpliced choir and an elaborate ritual, yet he can so adapt himself as be entirely at home in the simplest country chapel. He has no family except his wife, and as he is a man of great simplicity of life, and inured to hardships by years of frontier work, he will probably not occupy the handsomest Episcopal residence in Indianapolis, but make a home in some humble dwelling. He was the choice of the laity in the convention, while the clergy favored the candidacy of the Rev. Dr. Worthington of Detroit, the most popular preacher in that city. Of him, to illustrate his tact, and reveal one source of his popularity, the following anecdote is told: A lady called about some church work, and sent her card to his study, when suddenly he appeared in his violet dressing-gown that she had given him the previous Christmas. Hardly had she gone when another came, and lo! the reverened gentleman stood before her in a black cassock of which she had been the donor.

Last End of an Ex-Chicago Millionaire.

William A. Putney, at one time proprietor of one of the largest dry goods houses o Chicago, and rated among the millionaires, became hopelessly involved, and finally gave up his business on account of impaired health. He returned East and became salesman in the store of Shepard, Norwell & Co. The firm has missing considerable valuable goods. Detectives traced the thefts to Putney, and he was arrested at his summer cottage, Nantucket. The officers, with their prisoner, took a steamer to Boston. Suddenly, while chatting with the officers, he plunged overboard. He was taken from the water by the boat's crew, and died in ten minutes, aged 52. A large amount of stolen property was found in his residence at Boston and Nantucket.

Minnesota Churchmen on Divorces.

The following is the full text of the resolution passed at the session of the State Diocesan Council of Episcopal churches at Faribault last week, in regard to divorces:

Whereas, The alarming increase in the number of divorces granted and the continued enlargement of the various causes for which they may be granted shows the existence of an evil that threatens the foundations of society, therefore be it.

Resolved, That the delegates of this council to the general convention, be instructed to use their best effots to secure some action by that body, either by memorializing Congress to pass a general law or by referring the matter to the various Diocesan councils, or in such other manner as may seem best to them.

From the Burlington Free Press: "Who is that Thin, Sad Man—is he an editor? Oh, no, my son; the editor is fat and strong. The man you see was married when he was nineteen years old."

It cost $70 to raise 334 bushels of rice at a point in South Carolina, which sold for $340 in Charleston. Net proceeds, $270.

A special public meeting is to be held in New York to raise money for the widows of the men executed for complicity in the Phœnix park murders.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

Commencement at Carleton College.

Carlton college, Northfield, had its commencement on Friday. The class is of about the average size, there being sixteen members. In all of these seven graduated from the classical course, three from the literary, three from the scientific, and three from the modern or English. The exercises of the day were enjoyable, and compared favorably with those of previous years. President Strong reported the college in a flourishing condition, and that the institution has been crowned with marked success the past year, the new ladies' hall having been completed, being a valuable addition to the college. Also numerous other additions have been made during the college year just closed. 330 students attended during the year, representing eleven states and territories and thirty-five counties of Minnesota. Prof. Sperry was given a six month's leave because of impaired health. At the annual meeting of the board of trustees Prof. Noyes, president of the board, was re-elected, as were the other officers. The completion of the work of adding $100,000 to the endowment fund of the college was decided upon.

The following instructors were appointed: Charles H. Cooper, A. M. teacher of history and political economy; Lucian W. Chaney, jr., A. B., teacher of natural sciences; Miss Ellen F. Hunt, A. M., assistant teacher of Latin and mathematics, Miss Mary E. Boyd, M. A., assistant teacher of higher mathematics; Mrs. Mary R. Wilcox, teacher in the English course; Miss Alice M. Heald, teacher of instrumental music; Miss Helen F. Tupper, and Miss M. M. Dickonson, teachers of vocal culture and harmony and assistant teachers of instrumental music; Miss Althia R. Sherman, A. M., teacher of drawing and painting; Miss Anna F. Lincoln, matron.

Grand Lodge of Good Templars.

The sessions of the Grand Lodge of Minnesota Good Templars at Minneapolis was largely attended by delegates from the various lodges. The Grand Worthy Chief Templar Patterson reported 140 lodges in good standing, with a total membership of 5,875, making an increase of forty-nine lodges and 2,275 members over last year. A. F. Newt, secretary, presented his report, showing 140 lodges, with a membership of 5,875. The financial exhibit shows the total receipts to be $1,736.04, and the expenditures, $1,977.16. Reports from the various lodges showed the order in a more flourishing condition throughout the state than for years before. The committee on foreign correspondence, George W. Penniman, chairman, made its report, saying that there are now 290,790 Good Templars throughout the world, distributed through the seventy-nine grand lodges. The election of officers occurred in the afternoon with the following result: Representatives to the R. W. G. L., William P. Roberts and J. M. Dunham, with A. F. Newt and W. W. Satterlee as alternates; G. W. C. T., A. F. Newt; grand counselor, J. M. Dunham; G. W. V. T., Miss Nellie Seymour; G. W. S., Kate L. Penniman; G. W. T., C. N. Routle; superintendent of juvenile temples, Mrs. A. A. Batchelor. The committee on constitution reported several amendments, which were adopted. The meeting closed with the installation of officers.

A Minnesota Homestead Entry Case.

The commissioner of the general land office has written a letter to the land officers at Redwood Falls, Minn., directing them to reopen the case of Morey Dean, whose claim has been canceled by a former decision. The case was again brought to the attention of the general land office by a letter from J. H. Houston, who claims to have purchased the tract of Dean. The letter was to Hon. H. B. Strait, who referred it to the department. It appears that Dean had made a soldier's additional homestead entry of this tract in August, 1877, as additional to an original homestead entry of date Dec. 20, 1869. The tract in question is within the granted limits of the Hastings & Dakota railroad, the right of which attached March 7, 1867. Previous to this time the quarter section was entered by James Beebe, but was subsequently canceled for abandonment, for the reason that no member of Beebe's family was residing upon the land at the date of entry as required by law. This decision became final on default of appeal by Dean, and his entry was accordingly cancelled. It was, however, afterward discovered that the quarter section in question had been excepted from the operation of the grant, and that Beebe had resided upon and cultivated the land more than two years. On account of this error, the commissioner has decided to reinstate Dean's homestead entry.

The Deaf and Dumb at Faribault.

The annual closing exercises by the pupils of the Minnesota school for the deaf and dumb took place Tuesday afternoon in the chapel, which was filled with the friends of the institution, many coming from other cities. The exercises ended the twentieth year of the institution. Addresses, recitations, compositions, dialogues, etc., were given by a large number of pupils, in the sign language, a number of which were interpreted by the superintendent. Rewards were then given for good conduct to a number of pupils, two of whom, Miss Bergwale and Miss Cartee, had gone through the year without receiving one discredit mark. Diplomas were conferred on four graduates, who were honorably discharged, having finished the course and learned their trades: Frederick Reitz, C aska, Carver county, tailor; George Dougherty, Fountain, Fillmore county, shoemaker; Lars Larsen, Evansville, Douglas county, shoemaker; and Joseph Popkie, Rice county, carpenter. The exercises closed with the Lord's prayer in sign language by a pupil.

The Daily Northern Tier appeared on Monday the 18th and shows what Capt. can do when he pleases. He is a ready writer and has natural ability enough to creditably conduct an enterprise of that kind in any place that has the financial ability to back it but from the simple fact that it is too early in the day for a daily in Crookston we regard the enterprise with a very large sized doubt as to its ultimate success. Real estate will be benefited by a daily in Crookston and that's all there is that will be for the present, and there is not sufficient business done in real estate to support one just now. However, Capt., we wish you success in your venture and promise you that we will not lay a straw in your way (unless you commence.)

Hurrah!!

The town of Fairfax has said, by a petition containing 45 names (out of 56 voters) that she would have a New Era Grader. On the morning of Wednesday June 20th the town board met and accepted the petition, authorized the issue of the bonds and sent a man to the city to haul out a machine and this morning she puts the machine to work. She advertises in this issue for seven teams to work on the machine, six to run it and one to harrow after the road bed is completed. The JOURNAL takes great pleasure in being able to make this announcement for we have advocated this thing for a long time and we feel especially gratified to be thus endorsed by a rousing majority. The machine will be put to work early on Thursday morning and be kept at work all summer, just as long as it can run for the frost. Between this and that time the Board of Supervisors should get lumber, erect a shed and be ready to house the faithful servant as soon as it gets through its summer's work, so that it may be in good shape to begin another season's work next spring. Too much credit can not be given to the Fairfax town board for their public spirit and to Mr. M. E. Bartlett, who has labored faithfully to obtain signers to the petition to obtain the grader. Now let the good work go forward until Fairfax has the best roads in the county.

A Growing Evil.

We refer to a grain of mustard seed. Despise it, cast it down, rot it in the earth for many years then let it have a ghost of a chance at a bit of warmth and sunlight and lo! it rejoiceth and is glad throwing out a tender shoot which grows and expands and waxeth great, branching out into a great tree whose boughs and branches bud and blossom and bear millions of seed where-with to stock the neighborhood. This is no fancy sketch but a solemn truth and it is a growing evil in our land that must be met and conquered for verily the insidious weed is gaining a foothold in our land and must be put down. The law hath said it and every practical farmer knoweth it. In this case "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty" and if we would root out this growing evil every man who hath a wheat plant must wage a war of extermination on the pest nor cease until he has not a mustard plant upon his farm. His motto must be "Let no mustard plant escape!!" Pull them in season and out of season and the best season is now before they have a chance to go to seed There is a heavy penalty provided by law for neglect in this case and practical farmers are interested enough in some localities to see that the law is enforced If every farmer, however, will attend to his own mustard strictly there will be no need for others to do more than attend to their own mustard patch. We trust that not a mustard plant will be allowed to go to seed on any farm.

Fertile Items.

FERTILE, July 15, 1883.

We have had a fine rain and the grain is looking better than I ever saw before, except a few pieces which were sown with wet wheat. Breaking is being pushed ahead rapidly and a large amount of soil will be turned over this season.

Farmers in this vicinity have quite large herds of cattle and sell their young stock and milch cows for good, cash prices, so they are not entirely at the mercy of the wheat crop.

We are informed that Dr. A. Neson will visit this place two days each week for the practice of medicine. Those wishing to consult him will find him at his office in Gilmour's drug store next Monday. This is a move in the right direction, but we want the doctor to move here permanently.

Mr. O. L. Hamery intends to move to Crookston at once, and has deputized Mr. A. Gilmour as town clerk. Mr. G. will make an efficient officer.

Our school is progressing finely.

LaDuc & Co. have just received a fine stock of boots and shoes which are being sold at very low prices.

Mrs. A. A. Kilon is very sick.

Mr. Jensen, father of M. W. and A Jensen, of Garden, arrived from Waupacca yesterday. He is much pleased with the looks of our village.

The citizens of Fertile and surrounding country have concluded to celebrate the Fourth of July in the grove near the mill. Good speaking will be had in both the English and Scandinavian language, and vocal and instrumental music will be furnished. Plenty of refreshments will be on the ground. Tables will be spread for a basket dinner. A bower will be erected for dancing, and supper will be furnished at the Fertile House. Let every one turn out and help. We shall have a good time.

Council Proceedings.

COUNCIL CHAMBERS,
Crookston, June 19th, 1883.

All present except Alds. Stone and Braley. Contract for grading Ash Street awarded to McDonald & Omlie. Liquor license of Wm. Kistenmacher and J. B. Decarb granted. An advertisement of the city, in the "Iron World" ordered, not to cost over $100. Committee, consisting of Houston, Bang and Fortier appointed to consider the project of extension of time for payment of sidewalk and grade taxes to ten years. Pierce, Box and Houston appointed committee on ways and means. City marshal was instructed to order all persons who are harboring nuisances of any kind to abate the same at once. Bills allowed to the amount of $1,016.61. Adjourned until Thursday evening June 22d.

District Court Work

Up till the time we go to press but few cases have been decided, viz: Daoust vs Daoust verdict for plaintiff for $23.77. Town of Fisher vs Osmund Thomason; verdict for plaintiff for $110.00. The case of the Red River & Lake of the Woods R. R. Co., vs Andrew Sture is still on as we go to press. The grand jury, with Frank Bivins as foreman have brought in indictments against Peter Sullivan, charged with assault with dangerous weapons, A. Flom forgery; Jermiah Kelley, and John Fergusen larceny.

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Buse & Colbentson are now turning out a very nice quality of flour at their mill.

Isaiah Gervais has just bought a farm team, 5 and 6 years old, at $500.00, that is a beauty.

J. B. Carle living about 8 miles east of Red Lake Falls informs us several black bears have been seen in that vicinity lately. A chance for our local nimrods.

Gerke and Brunner have already about 16,000 brick of apparently good quality made, and expect to have a full kiln ready for burning in about two to three weeks.

Within about ten days, pile driving on Mr. Kretzschmar's mill-race will be completed, when the work of driving piles for the dam will commence. The flat boat which is to carry the pile driver and engine was launched last Saturday and is about ready for business. At the west end of the race; work is fast approaching completion.

County Commissioner I. Gervais is catching on for his share of the boom. He has just finished at his place, which adjoins P. Bottineau's addition on the south-east, a handsome barn 26x32 two stories high, and is now pushing a new dwelling 22x29 with a kitchen 20x20 two stories high. He expects to be right in town before long, and is commencing his improvements early. He has on his property a fine water power on the Clearwater, that he will either sell or improve soon.

Treasures of Classic Lore.

Theodore Martin, whom the Queen of England knighted, in honor of his excellent literary work, has written a remarkably brilliant and entertaining volume on "Horace," in the well-known series of "Ancient Classics for English Readers." No writer of antiquity has taken a stronger hold upon the modern mind than Horace. The scholar, the statesman, the soldier, the man of the world, the town-bred man, the lover of the country, the thoughtful and the careless, he who reads much and he who reads little, all find in his pages more or less to amuse their fancy, to touch their feelings, to quicken their observation, to nerve their convictions, to put into happy phrase the deductions of their experience. His wisdom is deeper than it seems, so simple, practical and direct as it is in its application. Over and above the mere literary charm of his works, the warm heart and thoroughly urbane nature of the man are felt instinctively by his readers. Dante ranks him next after Homer. Montaigne knows him by heart. Fenelon and Bossuet never weary of quoting him. LaFontaine polishes his own exquisite style upon his model. Voltaire calls him "the best of preachers." Lord Chesterfield tells us, "When I talked my best I quoted Horace." To Wordsworth he was equally dear. In Gibbon's militia days "on every march" he says, "in every journey, Horace was always in my pocket, and often in my hand." And so it is; in many a pocket where it might be least expected, lies a well-thumbed Horace; and in many a devout Christian heart the maxims of the gentle, genial pagan find a place near the higher teachings of a greater master. This entire series of "Classics' is most worthy to be added to the attractions of every home. There are 27 volumes, heretofore published at $1 each, now reduced to a mere fraction of that cost. They are published by John B. Alden, 18 Vesey St., New York, who will send descriptive catalogue free, on request.

Poultry Raising as a Business.

Mr. P. H. Jacobs, a practical poultry man, writes as follows in the American Agriculturist for July: A flock of ten hens can be comfortably kept in a yard, 20 feet wide by 50 feet deep. An acre of ground will contain forty such yards, or 400 hens. No cocks are necessary unless the eggs are desired for incubation. To estimate $1.50 as a clear profit from each hen, is not the maximum limit, but the profit accrues according to the management given. Poultry thrives best when running at large, but this applies only to small flocks. Hens kept by the hundred become too crowded while at large, no matter how wide the range, and sickness and loss occur. Large flocks must be divided, and the size of the yard required for a flock is of but little importance compared with that of the management. There is much profit to be derived from the sale of young chicks—and, where one pays attention to the business—they receive the greatest care. Each brood, like the adult, is kept separate from the others, in a little coop, which prevents quarreling among the hens, and enables the manager to count and know all about the chicks. This is very important, as there are many farmers who hatch scores of broods and yet cannot tell what became of two-thirds of them. Hawks, crows, cats, rats, and other depredators take their choice, and the owners are no wiser. Each sitting hen be in a coop by herself, and each coop should have a lath run. The critical period is the forming of the feathers, which calls for the frequent feeding, and when they have passed that stage, the chicks become hardy. The houses need not be more than eight feet square for each family, and can be doubled. If possible, it is best to have changeable yards, but, if used, a less number can be kept to an acre. If the yards are kept clean by an occasional spading, however, green stuff may be grown elsewhere and thrown over to them. This may consist of cabbage, grass, turnip tops, kale, mustard, lettuce, etc. Watering must not be neglected, or the meals given irregularly. Care must be observed not to feed too much, as over-fat fowls will lay but few eggs, and such eggs will not hatch. A good poultry manager is always among his fowls, and observes everything. The breeds have special characteristics also. The large fowls must be hatched in March, if early pullets are desired for winter laying. This applies to Brahmas, Cochins, and Plymouth Rocks. If the manager finds this impossible, he should at once substitute cocks of the Leghorn breed, which, crossed with large hens, make good marketable chicks, and produce pullets that mature early. A knowledge of the characteristics of the several breeds is indispensable to success. Crossing pure-bred cocks with common hens is excellent, but "fancy poultry" is not profitable to any but those who understand thoroughly the mating and selection of the several breeds

Use Borax in washing.

In employing a common, cheap, but clean soap, I often put less than a level teaspoonful of powdered borax into the bottom of my tub, pouring hot water on it, and then cooling to the proper degree. This borax makes the washing more easy, and is good for the hands, healing them when chapped, and leaving them in good condition after washing. Whatever good soap you use, it is not necessary to boil the clothes, but this process helps in most cases, especially if the clothes are well stirred about in the boiler. It is not best to leave them actually boiling many minutes, as this will turn them yellow. The whole washing may be done without warm water, if desired, but more or stronger soap must be used, and the labor is harder. We want to loosen the dirt between the fibres of the cloth as easily as possible, and then to rinse it all away. That is the philosophy of making soiled clothes clean.—F. E. R., in American Agriculturist for July.

The American Agriculturist for July presents a great variety of interesting and valuable matter. We give a few of the many topics treated: Stone Bridges, Commercial Fowls, Stems of Plants, Home-Made Cavers, Winter Radishes, Water Lilies, Hide and Horn Furniture, Home-made Tents, Home-Made Butter-workers, Enemies of the Melon Vines, Evaporating Fruits and Vegetables, Sheep Scab, Preventing Forest Fires, Application of plant Food. Among the numerous contributors to this number are the following: Orange Judd, S. B. Reed, Prof. J. W. Sanborn, Dr. Geo. Thurber, Prof. A. J. Cook, David W. Judd, Col. M. C. Weld, Rev. Wm. Clift, B. D. Halsted, Chas. H. Shinn, W. W. Meech, D. D. Bishop, Edward Pratt, J. W. Darrow, D. Z. Evans, A. B. Allen, H. A. Haigh, J. J. H. Gregory, Fred Grundy, W. H. Stone, E. E. Rexford, F. E. Russell, L. F. Beatty, I. Smithson, A. Carr. This number of the American Agriculturist is more elegantly Illustrated than any so far issued. It contains more than 70 original Engravings and Illustrations. The most valuable and practical of these are five designs for a House costing $2,500, and seven designs and engravings of a Prize Barn. The full-page Engravings by Halm and Cary are exceedingly beautiful. The Household Department abounds in Illustrations, and the Humbug Department now receives more attention than ever before. This month it exposes a large number of new frauds. Price $1,50 a year; single number, 15 cents. Orange Judd Co., Publishers. 751 Broadway, N. Y.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELla Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagamie, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagees, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 26th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 428 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100,) due on the 25th day of November, A. D. 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-five dollars, ($555,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 20th day of July A. D. 1883, at two o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

On motion the chairman appointed for County Central Committie, P. J. McGuire Ole Estenson C. A. Johnson, Dr. A. Nelson and A Dewey. Adjourned.

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Strangers are thick in town this week and so are the mosquitoes. They both "catch on" when they get a chance.

Judge Fjoser, of Crookston, was in town on Monday making arrangements to erect a building upon his lots adjoining to Mr. W. O. Wilson's residence. The Judge intends becoming a permanent resident of the New Chicago.

By actual count 27 teams, 80 persons and 126 head of cattle passed through St. Hilaire during the past week on their way to their claims north of town. Who says there is no good land to be found north of St. Hilaire.

E. M. Walsh and H. I. Hanscome, two of the Crookston merchants, tacked their signatures to the register at the European hotel on Saturday last. A new hardware store and lumber yard for St. Hilaire, will probably be the result of their visit.

The new residence which Judge Ives is erecting on the Company's townsite looms up this week in good shape and presents a neat and handsome appearance. The building will be completed in about ten days, when the Judge will move up and become a full fledged citizen of the New Chicago.

Miss. Van Wie, our accomplished school teacher has become so attached to St. Hilaire that she has concluded to locate here permanently after school closes, which will be in four weeks; she will open up a dress making establishment, a business with which she is as familiar as with teaching.

A story is going the rounds of the press to the effect that a big sea serpent has been seen in the Red River, but Wm. Wiley of Black River, has something that lays away over that: while out working in the field one day last week he heard a great splashing in a small ditch in the vicinity and thinking that some of his children had fallen in, rushed to the spot and discovered a large fish sporting in the mud and water of the ditch. He secured a rope and drew the monster out, when it proved to be a sturgeon weighing 42 lbs. The ditch was not tributary to any river and the water was only a few inches deep and now the query comes how did the monster get into it.

From the Times.

N. K. Olson of the firm of Berg & Olson, jewelers of Crookston, was in town on Tuesday. Mr. Olson owns a farm six miles northeast of here. He is well pleased with St. Hilaire, and will probably hang up his shingle here in the near future. Mr Olson is a good jeweler.

Fisher's Fancies

From the Bulletin.

They are breaking with 80 plows on the Donaldson farm near Kennedy, and report everything favorable for an immense crop this year. On this farm there are already 7,500 acres under cultivation, and by next year there will be 10,000.

Scarlet fever prevails in the town of Roome. Great precaution should be immediately taken to prevent its spreading.

State Supt. of Schools, Keihle, has promised to visit Fisher, sometime during the summer, and lecture on the subject of Graded schools.

The Steenersons have a new fangled hay rake and stacker. It looks like the Bunker Hill monument and is equally remarkable for perpetuating the inventor's genius.

The fisher Graders are working on a road and ditches from the Morais to the east town line; a distance of about four miles. It is hoped that work can be reached south of the river, where it is much needed.

Capt. Soper's steamer, the Arrow, is making regular trips on Devil's Lake. It is possible for steamers to go into nearly every part of the lake. Capt. Herman's steamer will be launched in the course of a few days. It has cost $40,000.

Chairman Brown has succeeded in placing $40,000 of Polk county bonds at the low rate of six per cent. per annum. It was mainly done through the personal efforts of the chairman and he is entitled to the gratitude of the tax payers.

C. B. Rockwood and Springer Harbaugh, of the town of Keystone, who pay five-sixth of the taxes of the town, desire to bond and improve highways, and do ditching. This is opposed because it is held that the large farmers will receive the greatest benefits. Although Mr. Harbaugh has one grader on his lands, he is willing and anxious that the town should have benefits and is willing to be taxed for it.

East Grand Forks, Facts

From the Courier.

A large delegation of East Grand Forkers are in Crookston this week, being subpoentrd on the Colby trial.

A large number of our citizens have purchased new suits of clothes—on strength of the saw mill, of course.

Mr. Hollinger is very busy at present in his carriage factory, and says he has more work than he can attend to.

The lumber is on the ground for the new Catholic Church, and its erection will commenced immediately.

Saturday evening excursions down the Red are now all the talk among the young folks on both sides of the river.

The school house is rapidly nearing completion. The work on it is first-class and its builders deserve all praise.

Rev. Dunn is having very poor health at present, the result of overwork, and his physician says he must discontinue study altogether.

There will be a special election Tuesday, June 26th, to vote on bonding the town for $5,000, to purchase a ditcher. Let everybody vote.

The elevator has been emptied, and over 10,000 bushels of wheat shipped during the last week. This has been done preparatory to receiving the fall crop of wheat.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, }
County of Polk. } ss. In Probate Court

In the matter of the Estate of John W. Farrel deceased.

On reading and filing the petition of John G. Farrel, of Polk County, Minnesota, representing, among other things, that John W. Farrel, late of Godfrey Township, in said county on the seventh day of June A. D. 1883, at Rat Portage in the Province of Manitoba, died intestate, and being a resident of this county at the time of his death, leaving goods, chattels, and estate within this county, and that the said petitioner is the father of said deceased, and praying that administration of said estate be to John G. Farrel the petitioner granted. It is ordered, that said petition be heard before the Judge of this Court, on Monday the 16th day of July A. D. 1883, at one o'clock p. m., at Crookston in said county.

Ordered further, that notice thereof be given to the heirs of said deceased, and to all persons interested, by publishing a copy of this order for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL a weekly newspaper printed and published at Crookston, in said county.

Dated at Crookston the 19th day of June A. D. 1883.

By the Court,

Well, this is warmish weather.

"School is out" for the long term on Friday.

Seely has everything, foreign and domestic goods.

E. St. Julien Cox, of Grand Forks is courting in the city.

Don't miss the Double Uncle Tom entertainment to-night.

N. P. Johnson has a 55 acre wheat field that averages 22 inches high.

Sampson's big roller mills will be enclosed and ready for the machinery soon.

Mr. A. Sawyer and lady have arrived to make Crookston their future residence.

Mike Leo departed for the front on Tuesday evening. He is going to Bismarck for awhile.

Polk County delegates, with A. Dewey proxy for John McLean, left for St. Paul on Monday evening.

E. D. North, of Glyndon, was in the city on Tuesday after extras for the New Era Grader owned by Glyndon township.

If you want anything liquid go to Seely's Exchange and ask Jack for a mixture that he alone knows how to conjure up.

Grading on Sampson's Addition is being done rapidly. As soon as it is completed the bridge will be built which will be at an early day.

Sheriff Zwickey has made his first trip to Stillwater and returned safe and sound. He took the first batch of prisoners down last week.

We piloted our best girl to Truax's ice cream parlors for an ice on Wednesday evening and we can say without punning that we had a-n-ice treat.

Capt. Barton, of Grand Forks, has been in the city in attendance at the Colby trial for a week past. By the way those Grand Forkers are numerous in the city this week.

Andrew Steenerson, Thor Haatvadt and Alderman Bang left for an exploring expedition to the withdrawn lands on Tuesday morning. They expect to be gone four or five days.

Callender's Georgia Minstrels had a crowded hall and gave universal satisfaction. The jokes were nearly all fresh and lively, the singing and music was just simply immense and everybody seemed well pleased.

B. M. Hall took his departure for his old home at Savona, N. Y., on Monday evening. As he shook hands with us at the train he regretted having to go and said that nothing but his father's failing health (and his girl) could induce him to leave at present.

Peter Cornelius has been exercising his privilege as Justice to get people into trouble. On Tuesday evening, at his residence in Crookston, he tied for life Mr. John Aas and Miss Anna Marie Anderson, both of Kertsonville.

Joe Barthiaume caught onto St. Paul's sergeant of police, C. Roleau, and brought him around to interview the JOURNAL man on Monday. The reportorial pump failed to find out what Roleau is up in these diggins for.

The Ada band gave our mayor a bit of a serenade on Monday evening. By the way, "that little German band" doughs up the music right smart. If the Ada base ball club can play as well as the Ada cornet band, they are hard to beat.

The road to St. Hilaire is at last completed, the last golden spike laid and now St. Hilaire is jubilant at her prospects. A good opportunity is offered to all who wish to see the famous city in the reduced rates offered for the celebration of the Fourth.

The JOURNAL has received a pamphlet, printed by the Moorhead News, which gives Moorhead and Clay County a first-class showing up. They don't say too much. We landed in old Clay County in '72, were there several years and we know somewhat how it is ourself. The News is doing good work for Moorhead and Clay County.

Rev. A. W. Edwards and family left for the Red Rock camp meeting on Monday evening. They intend spending a few days at White Bear ere their return. They expect to be gone about ten days and there will be no services in the M. E. church on Sabbath morning owing to the pastor's absence. There will be services in the evening however.

Mr. Chas. Truax has his ice cream parlors fixed up neatly, cosily and prettily. The rush on Monday proved so great that Charlie was obliged to add another room, making a neat little suit of parlors where you can at any time obtain a nice refreshing dish of ice cream, red-hot from the freezer. If you have not taken an ice at Truax's parlors go and do so at once.

The timber for the Sampson bridge is all out ready for business.

C. C. Utzinger, was down from St. Hilaire last week greeting hosts of old friends.

Warninger & Trombley have the Pilsner, Culmbach and Kaiser imported beer always on tap.

Charlie Seely has been painting and adding new pictures to his art gallery, at Seely's exchange.

The bridge on Robert Street is all ready for crossing save a little grading to be done at each approach.

Mrs. Charles Mix' mother, Mrs. White, has arrived to spend the summer with her daughter at St. Hilaire.

Mr. G. F. Copeland and wife have been in the city for a few days visiting with conductor Copeland's family.

Road grading in Fairfax is progressing nicely. At this rate there will be many and good roads in that town before fall.

The band and everybody else went out to the races on Wednesday. The streets were as deserted as Sunday or the Fourth of July.

Herb Mason, with creditable enterprise took a lemonade stand over to the fair grounds on Wednesday and coined wealth as he deserved.

Alex McKinnon arrived from Stillwater on Wednesday where he had been with Sheriff Zwickey to help get the prisoners safely housed in the nursery.

The grading on the side track to Sampson's Addition will all be done and ties hauled by Saturday night. The track will be laid in there as soon as needed.

The name of O. H. Lucken was presented by Polk County for the position of State Treasurer. No better man for the position could be found should he secure the nomination.

The JOURNAL is in receipt of the Gazette, a new paper just started at Garfield, in Walsh County, D. T., by W. W. Gilbert, formerly of this city and later an employee of the Grand Forks Herald.

Mrs. Edna Barnard gave an interesting lecture on temperance at the Baptist church on Tuesday evening. Her lecture showed a great familiarity with history and was enjoyed by all who heard it.

The New Era Graders are introducing a new era into Polk County—an era of good roads and a plenty of ditches. Every town that has one would not part with it and yet there is room for many more.

Much attention is being paid to road work in the different towns this year which is a good thing. Heretofore but little heed has been given to the highways and the result has been natural—bad roads. Let the good work go on until Polk County shall be noted for her excellent roads.

Pete Misgen wears a star. On Monday, at the picnic grounds he invited a party to go up to the cooler with him but received a polite refusal. After Pete had argued with him a little less than a minute the chap concluded the best thing he could do would be to go along without comment so he went.

The ladies of the Congregational society are holding a series of ice cream festivals in Dobson's grove this week. Let all who enjoy to help a good cause while partaking of a refreshing and healthy beverage go and sample the ice cream this or to-morrow evening. Remember the place Dobson's grove opposite Commercial hotel.

The time for pulling mustard is right now while it is about to blossom. Is is large enough to be seen and less trouble to get rid of than when it shall have gone to seed. There are several at work pulling in Fairfax, but there are also some there who are not, and we would advise them in a friendly way to get at it. The law provides a penalty for neglect to pull mustard and some farmers are watching that point.

New papers till you can't rest. This week "Huckleberry's Duel County Advocate," (any of that name get away, Huck?) appears bright and sassy and liberally patronized apparently and now comes Ed. Love's new paper, "The New York Mills Herald" (another tender loin; Why in the dickens couldn't you boys have found nice LONG names for your kids?) Well, anyhow, the papers are all right if they have not got much head and we wish them success.

St. Hilaire is going to celebrate the ever glorious in big style and invites all of Crookston and the rest of mankind to participate. They will indulge in every known game in the world and have gone outside of it after a band of Indians to fill vacancy. They "allow" that they are going to have a big time. A train will leave Crookston on the morning of the 4th at about eight o'clock a. m. returning about 5 p. m. Excursion rates, one and one-fifth fare, and a big time for all who go.

People who rave about this weather, calling it "hot," "melting," "awfully hot," &c., &c., ought to spend a portion of their summer in the Southern States. We "reckon" they would find out what hot weather means. While here, in the hottest days we ever have a cool atmosphere prevailing with now and then a refreshing breeze, down there not a breath of air in shape of a breeze is felt from early morn till set of day, but a dead, sultry, suffocating calm prevails constantly, and the nights that follow are just as sultry as they can be without the sun's rays. Here we have a delicious breeze frequently and the nights—could anything be more deliciously enjoyable? When disposed to find fault, think that it might be infinitely worse.

As we go to press the case of State vs Henry Steege is on trial.

Jack Confair is in from Maple Bay. Says he has his hotel nearly ready for business.

Capt. Arnold may be a fair average newspaper man but what he dont know about "dressing up" a street parade would fill a big book.

House to rent

Inquire of T. H. Bjoin.

Mr. Chas Bond is lying dangerously ill from blood-poisoning. Dr. Van Dyke attends him. The doctor tells us that it is a very serious case.

I'm a lawyer'n my name is Mark's—and mark you I want those little bills paid"—as John McLean said to the manager of the Spetacular last might after the show.

Conductor Jack Burton is in the city for a short lay off. He looks like it agrees with him to "punch, brothers, punch with care, punch in the presence of the passengaire" &c., &c.

Look out for fun to-night at Uncle Tom's Cabin, come and see the funny Colored Commedians. Pepper Williams, Parker and Franklin Pepper in their great imitation of the barber with his bones and their plantation singing, and don't you forget it.

House to rent.

Inquire of T. H. Bjoin.

In the races at the fair grounds yesterday there were entered Ed. Schrader's, Crookston Girl, Prof. Thompson's Garibaldi, Dunc Terry's Black Prince, D. Jacobus' two horses and G. B Ellis' Isaac. The first heat was won by Crookston Girl the last two by Garibaldi. The Prof. now swears by the old grey. There were upwards of 200 persons out to see the races and some money changed hands. We learn that there will be a big time out on the grounds on the ever glorious.

Kimball Pianos and Organs for sale at the American Express Office, Main street, Crookston, Minn. [31-tf]

Allen's Spectucular drama presented a spectacle not down on the bills. It was played after the big show was out. The creditors of the concern formed a syndicate (as it were) and commenced to move upon the enemy's works. A truce was called, a compromise affected and a settlement made on a basis of about 75 cents on a dollar. Should Allen ever "Spectacular-ate" in this city again he will doubtless promptly settle his bills and wont attempt to beat the Crookston boys again. They dont take to such rackets kindly.

House to rent,

Inquire of T. H. Bjoin.

Celebration of St. John's Day.

The procession was formed at 8:30 a. m. in Main Street in front of Ericsson's Hall, as follows;

Marshal Mounted.
American Flag.
Ada Brass Band.
The French Flag.
Committee of Organization.
Invited Guests.
Irish Flag.
Citizens on Foot.
Citizens in Carriages.

The line of march was via Robert, Broadway, Fletcher Avenue and Ash Street to the Catholic church where a solemn high mass was celebrated by Rev. Fr. Riviere, assisted by deacons, followed by a sermon from Rev. Fr. Boucher, of Fon Du Lac, Wis., on the topic of the day. The procession then re-formed as before and moved to Dobson's Grove, via Fletcher, Main, Second, Broadway, Fourth and Ash Streets, where a grand dinner was in waiting for the hungry. Owing to sickness in his family, the orator of the day, J. B. Paradis, was unable to be present. Mr. J. Dalpay, of Argyle missed his train and P. A. Dufour, Esq., failed to materialize so the speaking was off. The tug of war was contested by Captains Mike Leo and J. Bauvais, the prize, a silver cup was won by Leo. The 100 pin race could not be run because some unknown party had knocked down the pins. The fat man's race was declared off, no competitors appearing. The running race was contested by Dr. Gaboury and John Watts, the latter winning the 1st prize, a meerschaum pipe, and the former 2d prize, a fine silk hat. The first prize in the potato race was won by a son of Pat Clary, 2d prize by Ham Thompson. No competitors appeared for the sparring match so it was declared off. The Base Ball Match was gallantly contested by the Red and White Club vs the Blue and White Club. The Red and White club carried off the prize ball. Dancing. Miss Jennie Clary won the prize, a ladies work box. Supper was served on the grounds. Owing to inability to procure boats the boat race had to be declared off. In the swiming match, B. Carton, took 1st prize, an album, A. Bissaillion, 2d, $1 and J. Delaire 3d, 50 cts. No competitors appearing in the game of throwing the heavy hammer the game was declared off. It was decided best to have the fireworks up town instead of on a flat boat in the river as contemplated previously. A grand display was made and dancing engaged the attention of many until the wee sma' hours. The receipts were $675 and the expenses amount to nearly one-half of that amount.

Must be Sold.

We have FIFTY BUGGIES ranging in price from $65 to $250 which must be sold within ten days. Some one will get a good bargain. Call and examine at McKinnon Brothers Carriage Works Robert Street, Crookston, Minn.

Live Town! Grand Country.

Lots in the thriving town of Angus will be for sale on and after Monday next at the Red Star Office Broadway.

Court Cases.

Since our last issue the following cases have been on deck: The Grand jury found an indictment against Mollie Holton for keeping a house for immoral purposes; they found no cause of action against Sheriff Zwickey for shooting Israel La Fortune. Alexander Findlayson vs E. B. Clark, verdict for defendant in the sum of $108. John Sylvesterson vs J. Gammont, judgment for defendant. Jeremiah Kelley sentenced to States prison for two years, John Fergusen for one year and Chas. Libby for nine months, all for larceny. In the case of Wm. Reed a verdict of not guilty was found. In the State of Minnesota vs Colby the prisoner was acquitted. The Grand Jury reported that they found the jail wholly inadequate and insecure and strongly recommend a new jail. State of Minnesota vs Sullivan, assault with dangerous weapon, verdict of guilty

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELla Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagamie, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagors, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 25th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 438 and 439, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents ($12.58) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262.58) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured to be immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars ($558) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises therein described, at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post Office in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 10th day of August, A. D. 1883, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of that day, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated June 27th, A. D. 1883.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

Never the Time and the Place.

Never the time and the place
And the loved one altogether!
This path—how soft to pace!
This May—what magic weather!
Where is the loved one's face?
In a dream that loved one's face meets mine,
But the house is narrow, the place is bleak,
Where, outside, rain and wind combine,
With a furtive ear, if I strive to speak;
With a hostile eye at my flushing cheek;
With a malice that marks each word, each sign.
O, enemy sly and serpentine,
Uncoil thee from the waking man!
Do I hold the past
Thus firm and fast,
Yet doubt if the future I can?
This path, so soft to pace, shall lead
Thro' the magic of May to herself indeed!
Or narrow if needs the house must be,
Outside are the storms and strangers; we,
Oh, close, safe, warm sleep I and she—
I and she!

—Robert Browning

BARNEY'S PATIENCE.

BY N. DAGMAR MARIAGER.

His name was Barney McFlaherty. He was a man well built and muscular, a mechanic working for $5 per day, and beaming among his fellow laborers as a bright and shining light; all deemed it a delight to bask in Barney's eternal flow of sparkling wit when the day's work was done. There never could be enough praise of him; he was termed "the cock of the walk," a "hail fellow well met," indispensable as a companion, a lady's man, a fine dancer, and numerous other things at the mention of which a smile of satisfaction spread over his handsome face in acknowledgement of the compliment.

In his early youth Barney was "his father's own boy," but his mother, who was moldering in a neglected grave, he could call to mind only when an opportunity offered itself for making some period in her life the butt of a joke. With him it was come day, go day; his nature carved a leadership in some capacity; he loved flattery as he loved to flatter; whys, wherefores, and possible consequences were not to be considered; he could yield to the temptations of the hour; to-morrow would take care of itself.

At the age of twenty-eight Barney was a married man. His wife, a delicate little woman, had been an orphan from her childhood. At the time of her christening her parents had held a sharp argument as to whether the infant should be called Prudence or Patience, and though her mother, woman-like, had the last word, her father conquered, and she was named Patience Trodweighty. A kindly, but ignorant neighboring family had taken her home at her parents' death. They were all poor, and nothing of consequence was left her, but these people, poor though they were, had given her some education, and Patience had a fine sense of duty.

When she was 16, only one year prior to the opening of our story, the old people persuaded her to marry the dashing Barney, then on a short visit in the country, and who was smitten by her beauty of face and form. He would settle himself down and behave himself when he had a wife they said, and Patience, with childlike obedience, in gratitude for past kindness, and reluctant to displease her benefactors, who had a flock of children of their own to support, yielded to the plan and accompanied Barney to the city as his wife.

Barney had worked rather steadily in the meantime, even with late hours and dissipation. They lived in a small, one-roomed tenement, and boarded two blocks away at the cheapest restaurant, while he labored to get out of debt. Then they might start housekeeping on a cheap scale, and gradually build up home comforts, Patience thought, while she added her little mite by knitting wool shawls, which were sold at a store on commission.

Were only these troublesome debts diminished, instead of making daily fresh developments, then the struggle would be a comparatively easy matter. With bitter sighs and lonely tears she longed for the day when her cage should measure more than ten feet square; when she should have two windows, and no longer be compelled to look at the tin patches on the neighbor's dilapidated roofs, when she could afford a book or pay to read, and eat three times a day if she felt so disposed. In view of that hoped-for time, had it been approaching ever so slowly, she could have kept up a brave heart; but to see it receding made her concern for the future difficult to hide in the presence of her jovial and care-free husband.

What had she done to be thus tried? the childish wife of 17 asked herself desparingly. Would He who marks the sparrow's fall not pity her in the time of need? The faith she had been taught in Providence as a sender of relief to the disheartened at the eleventh hour she felt, in spite of her efforts to support it, was slowly dwindling and dying within her.

There were her reflections as Patience sat daily working by the dark little window. The chill of November weather numbed her fingers. She hoped the next trifle money realized from her shawls might be spent in procuring wood for warming the room, and putting the box stove standing in the corner once more in use.

"Why didn't ye come to work this mornin', Barney?" said a fellow workman to Mr. McFlaherty, coming from luncheon on a bleak, snowy day in December. "Why, what ails ye, ye are smiling all over!"

"Congratulate me, Fatty. I've got an heir. There is a boy up home—nice as you please. Now I want to know what do you say to that, old fellow?"

"That's way up! You're fixed up in business now, Barney. I'd like to see him, so I would; but I don't suppose your wife would let any of us fellows in up there. But it's time I was back to my work. You'll be down to-night and give the boys a shake, won't you, Barney? You know we've got to have a bouncer to the health of Master McFlaherty."

"I'll set up the drinks, Fatty, rest easy on that. I never went back on my friends yet, did I? That boy'll cost me plump $100, but that's all right. Tell the boys to prepare for a jamboree at Barney's expense. So long, Fatty."

The third day dawned upon the little stranger, and sent its accustomed dim light into the window and into Patience's room. The last candle had flickered out early in the night; the infant had cried for nourishment and other attention which its mother was unable to give. At 9 the doctor came, a cross old man of 50, who evidently knew his case was an unprofitable one. Inside the door he hesitated a moment in contemplating the contents of the scanty quarters, and then with ill-concealed displeasure burst forth:

"No fire yet! didn't I say distinctly that a fire must be made immediately and kept going in this weather? There! Well, if there don't lie my note of directions in the identical place I dropped it twenty-four hours ago. Well, well, that's encouraging!"

"I'm so sorry, doctor," replied Patience, in a choking voice, "but no one has been here since you left. My husband failed to come home last night. I've no food for the hungry babe, and I don't know what to do."

"And have you had nothing to eat or drink in that time?"

"Nothing since the tea he brought me before you came yesterday."

"Well, then, how do you expect to nurse the baby or nurse yourself?" said he, impatiently. "Let me see it," stepping to the bedside. "Good heavens! not a dry thread on it! As cold as ice, and eating its fingers and And you," catching hold of Patience's wrist, "are freezing too. Well, what else could be expected?"

"I believe, doctor, that some wood came for us yesterday; it was left out on the back porch, and if only I could have made the Chinaman hear me call, perhaps he might have built a fire for me."

The Mongolian was soon summoned, and when the room was warmed to a comfortable temperature the surly doctor proved himself not quite as heartless as he had tried to make believe. The infant was tenderly stripped, bathed, and made comfortable, while the servant went for refreshments for its mother.

"I'll ask the landlady to call in occasionally as I go down-stairs," said he, in a pleasanter tone, giving the babe into Patience's arms again.

"Oh, no, doctor, don't please do that she would drive us out at once if she knew the state of affairs."

"Well, then, I'll report your husband's doings to the police," said he, with renewed impatience in his voice. "The drunken scoundrel was raving through the streets last night like a madman, with a dozen of his clique following at his heels, and all howling like a pack of wolves."

"Oh, for mercy's sake, doctor don't do it?" cried the despairing wife. "It would do no good, and Barney don't mean to be unkind to me. You won't do it, doctor, will you?"

"Well, all right, then, I won't" was the angry reply. "If you like this treatment, I assure you I shan't envy you your lot; but this is my last visit. I have got no business where there is no one to carry out my instructions. Women are fools; natural fools! Good-day," and before Patience could speak again the irate doctor was gone.

Early in the afternoon Barney staggered into his wife's room with eyes half closed, face bloated, and the fumes of brandy enveloping him like a cloud. With a delirous look and thick tongue he made an effort to say:

"How is your boy, Patience? Is he getting big and fat? Here is a rattle I got for him to play with. Let's give it to him. He's a fine fellow! Let me kiss my little son."

With that he lowered his head over the infant, now in quiet slumber on its mother's arm. It fell heavily, and in a drunken stupor the father lay insensible, the weight of head and shoulders on the frail little infant. Frenzied with fright at the danger of her child, Patience shrieked for help; her very nerve was strained to hold him off, and the strength of her arms was superhuman in one in her condition. After a few moment's struggle she cast the murderer upon the floor. Then looking upon the lifeless body of her child she wailed as bereft of reason.

With the grief-stricken mother two months passed somehow—no one knew how; she did not even know herself, as the greater portion of the time she had been in a kind insensibility. She remembered some one beside Barney had made effort to care for her, a colored woman, who for a few weeks had been hired by him to attend her. This woman's nursing had brought Patience back to life. Barney was overjoyed to see his wife improving, and he poured into her ears her repentance; but it savored much of his natural shallowness. However, had it had a firmer foundation, it was too late. She loathed him as she might a snake that had stung her child. Never could she look upon her husband without a fancied recurrence of that awful hour.

Daily the invalid gained strength under the devoted but ill-paid care of the colored woman, who persistently continued to call a couple of times a day. Her husband has long since gone to his work again. At last she felt herself able to walk out of the room, the very atmosphere of which seemed impregnated with a waking nightmare. It was the dusk of evening; Patience Trodweighty, attired in her best robes, bade farewell to the MacFlatherty domicile, descended the stairs, stepped into the street, and went—but it don't matter where she went.

Barney found abundant sympathy for the loss of his Patience in his fellow-workmen, and a balm for his wounded heart in the cup put to his lips by fair and graceful women, earning their support by the sale of their smiles, little witticisms, and social toleration of such as he.

Patience's life, after her flight from her husband of a year, was neither a happy nor a long one. When she bade farewell to all earthly trials she was followed to her grave by women, some of whom were pure in heart, sincere in tender sympathy, capable of a fine sense of right, and bad souls full of true kindliness. But others of them were only out for the sake of parade; women such as nature had not deigned, on the day of their creation, to endow with a particle of the worthy instincts given in greater or less degree to most all creatures, both human and animal.

Facetious Points,

Benevolent—"When I dine with Mathieu" said Naupin, yesterday, "I never miss saying, on my arrival, that I have no appetite. Not that I eat any less afterward, but it causes him a happy moment."

No, Effie, my child. We are not an æsthetic. We only love the beautiful as it is materialized by the presence of the sex. We couldn't think of worshipping a sunflower or adoring a lily as long as you persist in setting on the sofa beside us.

A Buffalo Paper recently told of a lover who began to propose to his girl just as the horses started to run with the sleigh. Being determined to have it over with she got the question out at the moment the sleigh struck a mile post. The girl was thrown high into the air, but as she came down she uttered a firm "Yes, Charlie," and then fainted.

Harvard Lampoon: There is a Chicago girl who has been dying for the last two years, living, as it were, with one foot in the grave. The physicians have hopes, however. They say she can't get the other foot in—no room. St Louis papers please. copy.

Bachelor Jones—"The state would be better off if every Chinaman was kicked out of it to-morrow." His married friend—"Where would you get your washing done then?" Bachelor Jones—"Marry some nice girl and have it done at home." Chorus by six eligible young ladies who happened to overhear Jones and his friend talking—"The Chinese must go."

"You may talk about your mean men," said one rustic to another on the ferryboat the other day, but we've got a woman over there in Alameda who takes a pie." "Kinder close—is she?" "Close? Why last month her husband died—fourth husband and I'm blamed if she didn't take the door-plate off the front door, had his age added, and nailed on to his coffin. She said she guessed likely she'd be wanting a new name on the door soon, any way."

Passing Events.

The island lands of British Columbia have been thrown open to actual settlers at $1 per acre. Many Canadians are seting on the supposed line of the island railway. The latest advices from Ottawa are reassuring, and the Government has reason to believe that the terms of the Settlement bill will be carried out. The country is already showing signs of great progress under the influence of the new policy. Immigrants continue to pour in, and speculators anticipate a great land boom.

During the first act of "Old Shipmates," lately in Denver, at the Tabor opera house, quite a scene occurred. A parrot had been borrowed. The bird, when he became accustomed to the novel surroundings, commenced to display its accomplishments, to the amusement of the audience. "Lamb chops or breaded veal?" screamed Poll, bringing forth a loud "s-sh!" to which the bird responded with "Shut up—you make me tired!" following this up with a volley of oaths. The bird had to be carried off.

The spelling match has broken out again in Syracuse, N. Y., with the usual disastrous results. A student in the Syracuse university spelled "dough" "d-o-w;" a clergyman got left on "baptizable;" Professor Kinn, principal of the Madison school, spelled "twelfth" as if it were "twelvth," and Professor Griffin, teacher of Latin, Greek and German in the high school, got stuck on "omnivorous." "Myrrh" was spelled "M-i-r-r-h" by a young lady, who said she intended to spell it with a "u."

It will be appropriate in the future for Americans intending to visit China to go by way of Washington Territory, as there is talk of changing its name to Tahoma on its admission into the Union. Tahoma means "almost to heaven," and ought to be a fitting road to the Celestial empire. Tahoma sounds very pretty, and somebody ought to write a poem about it; but what is the matter with Washington? That name is in pretty good repute in this country, and might be left unmolested up there in the corner of the map, modestly taking a back seat behind a regiment of Indian names.

What is known as Valenciennes lace is made extensively at Ypres, Courtray, Ghent, Burges, and in almost all parts of Flanders; and in the production of one coupon of the fabric rarely less than 400 spindles and 1,500 pins are employed.

In the City of Monterey, in Mexico, by a peculiarly convenient arrangement, the cock-pit is close to the cathedral. This insures it a good attendance, as the great majority of those who attend the cathedral services also visit the cock-pit. The brutal sport is not put under the ban as it is in this country, and some even of the clergy make a common practice of attending.

"I know of no better illustration of the rapid increase of city property valuation," remarked Thomas Kirkpatrick, the jeweler, "than that of the Goelet property, which I have just vacated at Broadway and Nineteenth street. The two buildings which have just been torn down cost the Goelets $9,500 only. They never put a dollar's worth of improvement on either, though I and others did. Last year their income from the two was at least $25,000. I paid for my building $13,000 and the taxes, which often run up to $1,800 a year. A fine building is to be erected for one of the jewelry manufacturing firms, and the site is now valued at $550,000." The old mansion, in which the one surviving member of the Goelets still resides, surrounded with farm fowls and animals, and decrepit with age, is not to pass away until the occupant dies.—New York Tribune.

The Albany, N. Y. Milk Association has established a novelty in the way of lunch route, the working of which is thus explained by the secretary of the association: "The plan we have adopted is destined to become popular during the summer months. We have quite a number of customers now who are served with milk for lunch. You see the intention is to start the wagons on this route out at 11 o'clock, and keep them busy till 1. All telephone orders will be promptly answered, either by route wagon or one held in readiness. In warm weather a business man doesn't care about leaving his office for lunch, and, having a bowl, spoon, and some crackers it will bridge him over till supper time. We have been serving some lunch customers for a month past, and the number kept increasing so fast that we decided on establishing a regular route."

On Brooklyn Bridge.

Murat Halstead in Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

I walked over the bridge to Brooklyn to-day. The distance is something over a mile between the New York and Brooklyn starting places.

This bridge is the greatest work of human hands. The cathedrals that are the wonders of Europe are like toys beside this monstrous and magnificent structure, and its lines are as beautiful as its proportions are stupendous. It is very like the Cincinnati-Covington bridge, only very much more so. We have two cables; there are four here. I think the cables of this bridge are larger than ours, but so vast is their sweep that, as they soar above the lofty towers and swing far over the strait that they span they seem to grow slender. We have to inspect them closely to be satisfied of their enormous strength. The foot walk is in the center of the bridge, between the two central cables. Next outside the foot walk are the railroads, and outside of these the carriage drives. So there is a roadway for foot passengers, two lines of rails and two wagon roads. The bridge seems to dominate the cities. One looks down upon the beautiful bay and the far-spreading habitations on its shores, as from a mountain top. The bridge towers surpass the spires in apparent attitude, and either of them is as imposing as the Strasburg cathedral. The bridge will be the pride of the city, the favorite scene of its history and its romance. It will revolutionize currents of travel, change values, and the cities will be up in the architecture of the future to harmonize with its grandeur. With this stone from 100 to 200 years, Nova Scotia stone probably from 50 to 100 years, Ohio sandstone 100 years, Caen stone 35 to 40 years, coarse dolomite marble 40 years, fine marble 60 years, pure calcarous marble from 50 to 100 years, granite, according to variety, from 75 to 200 years. Among the chief destroyers of the stones are solvent substances washed from the air by rains, and the bridge and the elevated railroads, and the far-shining electric lamps, the possibilities of New York have been extended and illuminated, and the developments that are to come on the islands and penninsulas upon which we look from the bridge will exceed all that has gone before in the experience of mankind. Only in a few of the new buildings do we find the beginnings of the amazing city that is to be realized here, out of the consummate resources of civilization. How the wind blows on the bridge; it is with that air of continuity one marks on the prairies, or the sea.

Something for Everybody.

Read, Mark and Inwardly Digest.

ASHBURNHAM, MASS., Jan. 14, 1880.

I have been very sick over two years, and was given up as past cure. I tried the most skillful physicians, but they did not reach the worst part. My lungs and heart would fill up every night and distress me very bad. I told my children I never should die in peace until I had tried Hop Bitters. I took two bottles. They helped me very much indeed. I took two more; and am well. There was a lot of sick folks here who saw how they cured me, and they used them and are cured, and feel as thankful as I do.

MRS. JULIA G. CUSHING.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Jan. 31, 1880.

I have used seven bottles of Hop Bitters which have cured me of a severe chronic difficulty of the kidneys, called Bright's disease by the doctors.

RODNEY PEARSON.

WALHEND, KANSAS, Dec. 8, 1881.

I write to inform you what great relief I got from taking your Hop Bitters. I was suffering with neuralgia, dyspepsia, nervous debility, and woman's troubles. A few bottles have entirely cured me, and I am truly thankful for so good a medicine.

MRS. MATTIE COOPER.

CEDAR BAYOU, TEXAS, Oct. 28, 1882.

I have been bitterly opposed to any medicine not prescribed by a physician of my choice. My wife, fifty-six years old, had come by degrees of disease to a slow sundown, and doctors failed to benefit her. I got a bottle of Hop Bitters for her, which soon relieved her in many ways. My kidneys were badly effected, and I took twenty doses, and found much relief. I sent to Galveston for more, but word came back, none in the market, so great is the demand; but I got some elsewhere. It has restored both of us to good health, and we are duly grateful.

Yours, J. P. MAGET.

NEW BLOOMFIELD, MISS., Jan. 2, 1880.

Gents—I have been suffering for the last five years with a severe itching all over. I have used up four bottles of your Hop Bitters, and it has done me more good than all the medicines that they could use on or with me. I am old and poor, but feel to bless you for such a relief from your medicine and torment of the doctors. I have had fifteen doctors at me. One gave me seven ounces of solution of arsenic; another took four quarts of blood from me. All they could tell was that it was skin sickness. Now, after these four bottles of your medicine, I am well, and my skin is well, clean and smooth as ever.

HENRY KROCHE.

MILTON, DEL., Feb. 10, 1880.

Being induced by a neighbor to try Hop Bitters, I am well pleased with it as a tonic medicine, it having so much improved my feelings, and benefited my system, which was very much out of tone, causing great feebleness for years.

MRS. JAMES BETTS.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Feb. 2, 1880.

I know Hop Bitters will bear recommendation honestly. All who use them confer upon them the highest econiums, and give them credit for making cures—all the proprietors claim for them. I have kept them since they were offered to the public. They took high rank from the first, and maintained it, and are more called for than all others combined. So long as they keep up their high reputation for purity and usefulness I shall continue to recommend them—something I have never before done with any other patent medicine.

J. J. BABCOCK, M.D., & Druggist.

KAHOKA, MO., Feb. 9, 1880.

I purchased five bottles of your Hop Bitters of Bishop & Co., last fall, for my daughter who had been sick for eight years, and am well pleased with the Bitters. They did her more good than all the doctors or medicines she has taken, and have made her perfectly well and strong.

WM. T. MCCLURE.

GREENWICH, Feb. 11, 1880.

Hop Bitters Co.: Sirs—I was given up by the doctors to die of scrofulous consumption. Two bottles of your Bitters cured me. They saved my life and I am grateful.

LE ROY BREWER.

GREENWICH, N. Y., Feb. 12, 1881.

Hop Bitters are the most valuable medicine I ever knew. I should not have any mother now, but for them.

HENRY KNAPP.

LONE JACK, MO., Sept. 11, 1879.

I have been using Hop Bitters and have received great benefit for liver and kidney complaint and malarial fever. They are superior to all other medicines.

P. M. BARNES.

CLEVELAND, O., Oct. 28, 1879.

My better half is firmly impressed with the idea that your Hop Bitters is the essential thing to make life happy.

B. POPE. Secretary Plain Dealer Co.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Sept. 3, 1880.

Gents—I have been taking your Hop Bitters and received great help from them. I will give you my name as one of the cured sufferers.

Yours, MRS. MARY F. STARR.

GRENADA, MISS., Nov. 3, 1879.

My daughter, now a young mother, is using your Hop Bitters, and is greatly pleased with the beneficial effects on herself and child.

D. D. MOORE. Proprietor New South.

SANDERTON, PA., Nov. 6, 1879.

Dear Sir—I have used four bottles of your Hop Bitters and they have cured me. I had diarrhœa, dyspepsia, and chronic inflammation of the bowels, and was giddy in the head and nervous.

FRED THUNSBERGER.

PAULDING, OHIO, Feb. 2, 1880.

Gents—Have used two bottles of Hop Bitters in my family and think them the best medicine ever made.

GEO. W. POTTER, Banker.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Jan. 31, 1879.

Gentlemen—Having been afflicted for a number of years with indigestion and general debility, I used Hop Bitters, and they afforded me almost instant relief, I am glad to be able to testify in their behalf.

THOS. G. KNOX.

Sharper Than a Serpent's Tooth.

A week or two ago, a young man, belonging to an influential, honorable family, cheated a couple of business firms in a great western city, by false representations, out of a couple of hundred thousand dollars. The matter was brought before his father, an old man of stern integrity. The young man was his only child.

"Gentlemen, I can do nothing," he said. "I have paid nearly half a million dollars already to make up sums which he has embezzled. He has brought me to beggary. The law must take its course." He turned away. The road between him and death was short, and it would be dark and hard.

On the same week, an elderly woman was seen to throw herself into the Schuylkill river, near Philadelphia. She was rescued with difficulty. She held in her hand a satchel containing gold, notes and bank books representing several thousands of dollars. When she recovered her senses she was asked,—

"Why did you do this? You were in no danger of want."

"No; I had money enough. But I had five children once, four boys and a girl. They all went away, all went away. They have not wanted me to visit them, and they do not write to me. I have waited for years, and they have not come back. Folks told me they were doing well, and were fine gentlemen and ladies; but they have forgotten their old mother. I was so lonely that my head got queer. Indeed, gentlemen, I tried to do all I could for my little children; but when they grew up they were tired of me."

No words of ours can add to the force of these two chapters of actual life. Very few sons and daughters are as guilty as these, but how few are wholly free from such guilt? Many a man or woman who would not take the life of the poorest living creature, kills the souls of those who love them best, by years of passive, cold forgetfulness and neglect.—Youth's Companion.

Personal Mention.

Wilde varied his lecture at Baltimore by telling the people that what they needed was a school of design, to give them some good architecture. "You don't want any more bronze generals careening at every corner of your streets, as I saw them in Washington." He also advised them to dance the minuet and not the polka.

General Hancock is as regular as a clock in his habits. Every afternoon at the same hour he takes a nap of a certain length. This is supplemented by a walk around the island, and the young officer on duty as officer of the day is sure to keep a sharp lookout and see that the men are all attending to their duties when "the general" makes his rounds.

Lady Wilde, the mother of the great æsthete, who wrote some of the fiercest of the rebel songs of 1848, is, as is her son, opposed to the Land League. She shares the views of Mr. P. J. Smyth, M. P. for Tipperary, and many of the boldest and self-sacrificing patriots of '48, that the Land League appeals to the lowest and meanest instincts, is communistic in its character and unworthy of the spirit of the nation.

When Meissoneir finished the portrait of ex-Gov. Stanford, that gentleman was anxious to have the act of signing witnessed by his young son, and took the boy with him on the day of the last sitting. But Meissoneir had already affixed his signature. Mr. Stanford expressed regret, stating his reason. Meissoneir effaced his name, and said smilingly as he resigned the portrait: "You see, my boy, that your father's portrait is undoubtedly a genuine Meissoneir."

A Splendid Remedy for Lung Diseases

Dr. Robt. Newton, late president of Electric College of the city of New York, and formerly of Cincinnati, Ohio, used Dr. Wm. Hall's Balsam very extensively in his practice, as many of his patients, now living, and restored to health by the use of this invaluable medicine, can amply testify. He always said that so good a remedy ought not to be considered merely as a patent medicine, but that it ought to be prescribed freely by every physician as a sovereign remedy in all cases of Lung diseases. It is a sure cure for Consumption, and has no equal for all pectoral complaints.

A Lasting Benefit.

The world, it has been said, has more need of philanthropist than of philosophers, a truism which has been fully verified in the case of the inventor of Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters, who has given to the suffering public the most potent remedy for dyspepsia, indigestion, and their attendant ills, ever offered and thereby conferred greater benefits upon mankind than the whole school of philosophers from the days of Zeno and Socrates to the present time. TUTT'S EXPECTORANT

Is composed of Herbal and Mucilaginous products, which permeate the substance of the Lungs, expectorates the acrid matter that collects in the Bronchial Tubes, and forms a soothing coating, which relieves the irritation that causes the cough. It cleanses the lungs of all impurities, strengthens them when enfeebled by disease, invigorates the circulation of the blood, and braces the nervous system. Slight colds often end in consumption. It is dangerous to neglect them. Apply the remedy promptly. A test of twenty years warrants the assertion that no remedy has ever been found that is as prompt in its effects as TUTT'S EXPECTORANT. A single dose raises the phlegm, subdues inflammation, and its use speedily cures the most obstinate cough. A pleasant cordial, children take it readily. For Croup it is invaluable and should be in every family. In 25c. and $1 Bottles.

TUTT'S PILLS

ACT DIRECTLY ON THE LIVER.

Cures Chills and Fever, Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Bilious Colic, Constipation, Rheumatism, Piles, Palpitation of the Heart, Dizziness, Torpid Liver, and Female Irregularities. CONSUMPTION

PLAIN TRUTHS

The blood is the foundation of life, it circulates through every part of the body, and unless it is pure and rich, good health is impossible. If disease has entered the system the only sure and quick way to drive it out is to purify and enrich the blood.

These simple facts are well known, and the highest medical authorities agree that nothing but iron will restore the blood to its natural condition; and also that all the iron preparations hitherto made blacken the teeth, cause headache, and are otherwise injurious.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS will thoroughly and quickly assimilate with the blood, purifying and strengthening it, and thus drive disease from any part of the system, and it will not blacken the teeth, cause headache or constipation, and is positively not injurious.

Saved his Child.

Feb. 12, 1883.

Gents:—Upon the recommendation of a friend I tried BROWN'S IRON BITTERS as a tonic and restorative for my daughter, whom I was thoroughly convinced was wasting away with Consumption. Having lost three daughters by the terrible disease, under the care of eminent physicians, I was loth to believe that anything could arrest the progress of the disease, but, to my great surprise, before my daughter had taken one bottle of BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, she began to mend and now is quite restored to former health. A fifth daughter began to show signs of Consumption, and when the physician was consulted he quickly said "Tonics were required;" and when informed that the elder sister was taking BROWN'S IRON BITTERS, responded "that is a good tonic, take it."

DONE IN THE DARKNESS.

We parted in silence, we parted by night,
On the bank of a beautiful river;
No sound but a gurgle, as, out of my sight,
Swift she sank, with scarcely a shiver.

The nightingales warbled, the stars sweetly shone,
And, though she will rise again never,
No sorrow was shown for the life that had flown—
For that cat is silent forever.

MRS. GRESHAM'S IDEAL.

BY MARY REED CROWELL.

It would have been impossible to have anywhere found a sweeter-looking woman than Mrs. Gresham—fair-haired, dewy-eyed, with lips like strawberries half-smothered in cream—and she was a young widow.

"But Mrs. Gresham, I think you must be crazy!" Bessie Baldwin said, at which remark Mrs. Gresham smiled.

"Not at all. It is simply that I am tired to death of the endless routine of fashion and society, and that I don't intend to endure it much longer."

"But one can't run away from society and fashion."

"No?" Mrs. Gresham laughed. "Very well; I intend to make the first experiment in that direction then. I know you will laugh at me," she went on, "but I really do not see why my plans should not work, for—"

"Do tell me plainly and at once, what your mysterious plans are, you provoking little woman?"

And Bessie Baldwin's own bright eyes were as full of curiosity as it was possible for a young girl's eyes to be.

"Well, then, let me tell you, I intend to out-and-out desert Mrs. Nettie Gresham, to leave her behind in this big, handsome house, while Mrs. Nettie Smith is going to spend the summer in the most outlandish country place she can find. Perhaps I should speak more plainly, and tell you I deliberately mean to lose my own identity, and thereby possibly find some enjoyment."

"But your friends?"

"They are not to hear a word of it."

"But your dozens of sighing cavaliers?" Bessie laughed.

"Let them sigh away. I haven't the slightest pity for one of them."

"Really, no?" Really, not any pity for Mr. Hugh Osmond?"

And then, by the way Mrs. Gresham's eyelashes fell, it was evident that Mr. Hugh Osmond did not stand exactly on the same level with the rest of the "sighing cavaliers."

"Confess now, Nettie, you do like him," cried Bessie catching instantly at the momentary relenting, as she captured both of the widow's lovely hands and surveyed the flushed, tell tale face.

"Well, yes," Mrs. Gresham answered frankly, "I do like him a little. But Bessie, he is too delicate, too effeminate. He makes me think he has been cradled among rose-leaves and fed with the rarest wines of life—a regular Sybarite! Do you know, Bess, I could not really look up to a man who only excels in leading the German, and who is noted for wearing the handsomest neckties in New York?"

"Did I ever hear such nonsense!" answered Bessie.

"Very likely not. All the same, it is my theory," Mrs. Gresham persisted, with a wicked, little laugh. "Now, instead of further discussing this subject, come and let me show you the delicious wardrobe I have prepared for the woods—cambrics, calicoes and flannels, for I tell you I am going to a real, genuine farm-house."

And Mrs Gresham carried the day and actually took Bessie Baldwin with her to the red-gabled, old farm-house, in Northern New Jersey, where to breathe the clover-scented air was like a draught of spicy champagne. But after awhile, as even Arcadias may pall, so this country life, which was such a contrast to Newport and Saratoga, began to grow somewhat monotonous.

"Its just a little dull, isn't it?" Bessie said to Mrs. Gresham, one morning as they lay half asleep in their respective hammocks on the shady piazza.

"No!" Mrs. Gresham persisted, gravely. "It is not. It is delightful! And just think what it will be when the new box of books comes!"

Mrs. Kent, the landlady and farmer's wife, came around the corner of the house just of that moment.

"I was afeared you'd find it a bit lonesome," she said with the unconscious familiarity which so delighted our two city ladies. "It usen't to be so lonesome when our Moses lived to home, but somehow there don't seem to be no young folks around now. Judge Winter's nephew, he came up to the big house yesterday—he comes every year about this time; but then, he ain't much account, for he is one of your high-and mighty ones, and ain't very free in his ways."

"What a dreadful pity!" Bessie said, gravely.

"Yes, ain't it?" Mrs. Kent went on, entirely unsuspicious. "Judge Winter's folks are rich, and everybody likes 'em and they've lots of city company, and we've supplied the eggs and butter, and cream and berries, and such like for ten years or more back. Wouldn't you like to go up and look at the grounds? It's the prettiest place you ever see."

Mrs. Gresham shuddered at the idea of the "city company" she had come so far to escape.

"Bess, she said, after Mrs. Kent had returned to her duties, and the two sat silently for some moments, "how would you like to see this young Mr. Winter?"

"See him? Why, what for?"

"Oh, I don't know! But, do you know, Mrs. Kent has talked so much about him that I imagine he must be a real hero—different, you know, from our city silk-and-silvers."

"Nettie, you are not going to fall in love with this rustic Adonis over whom Mrs Kent raves so?',

Mrs Gresham's laugh rang out softly.

"What if I should tell you the mischief was half done already? I do really believe, Bess, I could think a good deal of such a man as he must be—so noble, so single-hearted, so strong and so manly. Why, just remember how enthusiastically Mrs. Kent tells of his bravery in rescuing those two little girls from the burning farm-house, actually risking his own life for theirs! How is it, Bess, we never meet such men in New York city?"

"Nettie, your enthusiasm is all wasted on me, and if it wasn't wicked, I'd bet a box of six kids, assorted colors, that he has red hair, a stoop in his shoulders, and freckled from temple to chin."

Mrs Gresham turned almost indignantly upon her.

"The idea! What an imagination you have—in the wrong direction! Mrs. Kent explicitly stated that he was as handsome as handsome could be."

"And Mrs Kent is undeniably a good judge!" Bess laughed, ironically, which ultimatum silenced Mrs. Gresham upon the subject,

Nevertheless, the next day, when Mrs. Kent started upon her daily pilgrimage to the Winter mansion, with her pitcher of cream, a basket of raspberries, and another of pearly-shelled eggs, Mrs. Gresham persuaded Bess Baldwin to go too.

"We needn't be seen, you know," she said; "and really it will be quite an adventure—quite a break in this monotonous life of ours."

"Oh, so it is monotonous, after all," Bess said, with a merry sparkle in her eyes.

But as they neared the lovely pleasure grounds of Judge Winter's superb place, Mrs Gresham's courage suddenly failed her.

"Bess, we'll not go any further—not even to see my ideal," she laughed; and then, to Mrs. Kent—"We'll wait here until you return, in this delightful little arbor."

It was indeed a lovely spot, full of lovely gold and green shadows, and Mrs. Gresham's enthusiasm was not at all unwarrantable, as with her straw-hat strings untied, she pushed it far back upon her dainty little head, and let the cool, westerly breeze fan her forehead.

"It's the loveliest place I ever saw!" she exclaimed, enthusiastically, "and —Who's that?"

She started as a quick, firm step sounded near them, and then a man's tall figure entered the vine door of the arbor.

"Mrs. Gresham!"

And to her surprise she recognized Mr. Hugh Osmond.

For one instant there was embarassment, and then Mrs Gresham's society manner came back to her.

"So you are one of Judge Wintor's visitors, of whom we have heard so much," she said, after the had exchanged mutual greetings, and Bess had laughingly revealed the unknown of the farmhouse adventure. "Since you are stopping here, perhaps you can tell me something about my favorite hero, Judge Winter's nephew, who—"

"Continue the confession, Nettie," Bess interrupted, with a merry laugh; "be honest, and tell Mr. Osmond how desperately you have fallen in love with this nephew, by hearsay."

"Yes, I have," Mrs. Gresham confessed, with a little laugh, and yet flushing faintly to the very edge of her lovely hair. "Why not? I am not ashamed to confess that he is my beau ideal just at present. Do tell us about him, Mr. Osmond."

But Mr. Osmund looked perplexed and puzzled.

"I don't understand what you mean," he said, "Judge Winter has but one nephew, and I have the honor of being that individual."

"You!"

"Yes, I."

Mrs. Gresham colored almost as deeply as the Jacqueminot rose at her waist.

"But I—I didn't suppose—I thought you were merely a city exquisite—I didn't—"

And utterly hopeless of finding her way out of the complexity of sentences, Mrs. Gresham stopped, and actually burst into tears!

Mr. Osmund was instantly at her side.

"Nettie, Nettie! have I said anything—"

And then Bessie started up.

"Dear me! if there isn't Mrs. Kent coming back! She looks as if she wanted to speak to some one about somesomething. I'll just run and see what it is."

But Mrs. Kent was not coming, and did not come for fully half an hour later. But, all the same, it was a pardonable deception, and when she did come, Bess made some excuse for Mrs. Gresham, and took the good-natured unsuspicious woman home under her own wing.

It was two hours later, and the boss was reading in her room, when Mrs. Gresham joined her.

"What have you to tell me?" Bessie demanded, half autocratically, half in tender coaxing.

"Well, I have done it," Mrs. Gresham said, half laughingly, half crying.

"Done it? Done what?"

"I promised to marry him!"

And then Bess ran up and kissed the rosy, quivering lips, rapturously.

"Oh, you darling!" she cried. "But you know you would never have done it if he had not been Judge Winter's nephew."

"I—I don't know. But one thing is quite certain—I never knew him until I read his character out here in the country. And of another thing I am certain—yes, quite, quite certain, Bess—I love him dearly, dearly!"

To be Continued.

From the Detroit Free Press.

As the boat put in at James' Landing Ark., we saw four steers tied to a fence, and every passenger at once carried his chair over to the port side to see the fun. If there is any fun about steamboating it is to load a number of stout steers, with wild eyes, long horns and handy legs. They don't accept circumstances, and they have no romantic notions about sailing up or down the Father of Waters. As soon as the plank was lowered the mate and a dozen darkies started for the cattle, the officer singing out:

"Look alive, you niggers! On with e'm now—what are you doing?"

With a great deal of hooking, and prancing and shouting and kicking the first steer was pushed aboard. When the second was tackled he branced his legs, held down his head, and six men could not budge him. The mate went around behind to twist his tail, and as he gave a twirl at that useful appendage he shouted out:

"Now, then, every nigger break his back! Up with him. Boost—boost —!"

At that instant the steer's heels took a shoot out behind, and the mate rolled over the grass. Some of the men went to him and called him fond names, and unbuttoned his vest and stole his plug tobacco, but he was dead. When the cattle were loaded we took him on and laid him out on some sacks of corn, and as the boat steamed away we all spoke well of the dead. Some said he had a kind heart for all his bluster, and others affirmed that if ever a steamboat man went to heaven this one surely slipped in for his charity towards the poor. We were about to draw up resolutions of sympathy to present to his widow, and to make up a purse for embalming his body, when the miserable sinner suddenly sat up, gasped once or twice, and continued:

"———him up higher than Gilderoy's kite! Now with him! Now up! Why, you niggers, I'll murder the whole pack of ye!"

When he found out that he had been dead for half an hour he was dumbfounded. The idea that the mate of a steamboat should succumb to anything else than a blow-up annoyed him so that he sat down on a pile of bacon and wept.

Shall We Smell by Telephone?

I asked Judge Bleckley, the other night what he thought would be the direction of invention and progress the next thirty years: "I should say," he replied, "the application of the principle of the telephone to the other senses. A few years ago the distance at which you could hear a sound was limited. Now it is practically without a limit. You can smell a flower only at a short distance. I do not see why a telephone for the nose might not enable you to smell a rose at New York, even though they were located at Atlanta. So of the taste and touch. A new application of the principle of the telephone might enable you to remain at Atlanta and kiss your wife at London, or taste a berry at Paris. The telephone has already made a clumsy step in this direction for the sight. We would have thought the man crazy a decade ago who said you could stand at New York in 1883 and hear every note of a concert at Boston. Quite as crazy as the man who now predicts that in 1803 you may sit down at Atlanta, see a theatrical representation at Cincinnati, smell a bouquet at New Orleans, taste a fresh oyster at Baltimore, and shake hands with a friend at Savannah, all at the same time. In these days it is only the impossible that happens."—Atlanta Constitution.

The roof of a poor widow's house in Corvallis, Oregon, was burned off a few Sundays ago. All the town turned out to assist the only engine, and the hook and ladder company in extinguishing the flames, and before they were fairly out the crowd made up a fund of $600, which it was thought would be sufficient to repair the damage done.

Lord Dufferin, it is said, was allowed to choose between a marquisate and the blue ribbon of the garter. He chose the latter. Either honor is expensive, the patent and stamp fees in the case of the marquisate costing $15,000, and in the case of the order of the Garter the expense is fully $500.

Says the London Queen: "The prettiest woman at the private view of the Royal Academy in London was the wife of an artist; the handsomest, the wife of a well-known journalist; the worst dressed, a lady who has written a book to teach how to dress; the best dressed from an artistic point of view, Mrs. Jopling. The tallest man was Corney Grain."

The oldest commanders of German corps d'armée are General Tumpling, Baran Barnekow and Baron Manteuffel, each of whom has attained the age of 74 years. Among the French generals on the other hand, the oldest, Lecomte and Lilieniand, are only 66. Indeed, the average age of German generals (67) is seven years greater than of the French (60.) Lord Nepier, the oldest English general, is 73 and the average age of his compeers is about 63.

John G. Whittier often writes impromptu verses, in albums and elsewhere, bright with a gayety that does not often appear in his more important works. Not long ago he wrote in the album of a young lady—who with her friends had been rallying him on his bachelorhood—the following lines:

"Ah, ladies, you love to levy a tax
On my poor little paper parcel of fame;
Yet strange it seems that among you all
Not one is willing to take my name—
To write and rewrite till the angels pity her,
The weariful words, Thine truly,
WHITTIER."

Chester W. Chapin, the millionaire, who died at Springfield, Mass., on Sunday was the New England Vanderbilt. He began life as a stage driver on rough country roads, and when the age of steam came on, naturally turned his attention to the construction and operation of iron ways for transportation. Mr. Chapin was for many years president of the principal New England railroad—the Boston and Albany—a contemporary and crony of the elder Vanderbilt, and a man after the commodore's own heart.

A Paris correspondent writes that Edwin Booth's daughter has taken part in private theatricals in that city, but shows little talent for the stage. In another generation there will not be a Booth in "the profession," unless some of the grand-children of the late Junius Brutus should come to the fore. It would seem strange, indeed, to find this illustrious name no longer on our play-bills.

George W. Cable, the novelist, is a very quiet little man, who was formerly a clerk. His life has been spent in New Orleans; he is a pious man, who attends largely to the official business of religious corporations, he does not read French novels, although one might from his style think that he does, and he has never attended a theatre. He is about 42 years old, and he does not think that he writes novels when he is describing Creole life. He does not know what alcoholic liquors taste like, and has lived in New Orleans all these years!

Varous Kinds of Drunkards.

From Chamber's Journal.

Some men seem to become drunk suddenly, giving no previous indication by thickness of articulation or unsteadiness of gait; this being commonly the case where mental excitement from other causes—as a heated discussion—prevails at the time. The most dreadful and astouishing cases are afforded by those unfortunate people who are never sober. How they manage to survive so long as they do is a mystery. There are men who have been perpetually under the influence of liquor for twenty or thirty years. Of course, the brain must have become permanently injured, so that we may infer that the drink these persons now take has little or no real effect on them, and that there state would be just the same without it. Others, again, are systematic and punctual drunkards of regular habits, men who take their quantum and are put to bed unconscious every night, yet are capable of attending their daily business in the most extraordinary manner. These, as a rule, never exceed a given amount by so much as a glass, and do not suffer so much as intermittent drunkards—at any rate, not so soon, for the inevitable consequence is only a little longer deferred. The writer knew an old doctor in Jamaica who used to aver that the climate was the finest in the world. "Yellow fever sir!" he would exclaim—"not a bit of it! A vulgar chimera! A malicious libel on us! The fact is; it's the vicious irregular habits of the people here that kills 'em. Look at me! I have done so for thirty years. I get tipsy seven times a week, in an orderly and decent manner; and I've never had a yellow fever nor a day's sickness!" And to all appearances he was a fine healthy man of 65 or 70 years with a beard as white as snow. Yet he was carried off suddenly by a trifling indisposition incidental to the climate, and it was found on examination of his papers after death that his age was only 62.

It does not by any means follow, either, that because a man is never intoxicated he may not be drinking too much. Men employed in the great breweries in London, especially the draymen consume an enormous quantity of beer. The daily allowance which their employers give them is a very large one, but they rarely confine themselves to that, and the draymen, in addition get much gratitiously from the customers to whom they are always delivering the casks; so that ten or fourteen quarts is no exceptional consumption for one man; yet they are not drunkards in the ordinary sense of the term. The very nature of their work necessitates the employment of none but steady men, strength being also a sine qua non. But if one of these men should break a limb or get confined to bed from any other accident, he is almost sure to get delirium tremens; and a scalp wound frequently kills him. Brewer's men are notorious in hospitals as being the worst cases for operation, being prone to exhibit all the most dangerous complications which fetters the success of surgical treatment.

THE BRIGHT SIDE.

There is many a rest in the road of life,
If we only would stop to take it,
And many a tone from the better land,
If the querulous heart would wake it!
To the sunny soul that is full of hope,
And whose beautiful trust ne'er faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright,
Though the wintry storm prevaileth.

Better to hope, though the clouds hang low,
And to keep the eyes still lifted;
For the sweet blue sky will soon peep through,
When the ominous clouds are rifted!
There was never a night without a day,
Or an evening without a morning,
And the darkest hour, as the proverb goes,
Is the hour before the dawning.

There is many a gem in the path of life,
Which we pass in our idle pleasure,
That is richer far than the jeweled crown,
Or the miser's hoarded treasure,
It may be the love of a little child,
Or a mother's prayers to heaven;
Or only a beggar's grateful thanks
For a cup of water given.

Better to weave in the web of life
A bright and golden filling,
And to do God's will with a ready heart
And hands that are swift and willing,
Than to snap the delicate, slender threads,
Of our curious lives asunder,
And then blame heaven for the tangled ends,
And sit, and grieve and wonder.

PURIFIED AS BY FIRE.

BY MARY REED CROWELL.

Ethelyn Hurst drew her pretty, slight figure up to its full height, and flashed the full light of her lovely brown eyes upon old Aunt Agatha's face, who had just foretold that she should stand face to face with death before the stars should come out that night; for Ethelyn was proud, and always treated the poor with unkind haughtiness.

"I don't want to hear another word of your nonsense," she said, as she picked up her azure lined, white silk parasol, and took her departure.

That afternoon, Ethelyn and her friend Lillian Lane, went off to a wild, lovely spot, to spend the long, warm summer afternoon, after which they proposed to drive to the depot for Ethelyn's lover, Fred Westerly, who was coming to the seaside hotel that evening for a two week's outing.

It was a lovely, but lonely spot to which the girls went, shut in by uprising solemn cliffed rocks, at whose base rushed and roared the contending waves; a place so grand and gloomy, that Lillian Lane shuddered as she looked about its solemn sanctuary.

"Oh, Ethelyn, it makes me afraid! Aren't you afraid?"

Miss Hurst glanced up bright and fearless.

"Afraid? afraid of what?"

And somehow, Lilian felt ashamed to express her feelings upon the subject again.

Then, becoming engrossed in their books, they soon forgot their external surroundings, and it was not until the sun had gone down that Lilian suddenly aroused.

"Why, Ethel, I had no idea it was so late! It is after sundown—it is long after tea time,"

"Of course it is. But what a splendid afternoon's enjoyment we have had! We will go now, however."

"But, Ethel," Lillian said, as she involuntarily drew nearer to her companion; "look there! That was not there when we came here! See, the ocean is washing all along in front of the rocks, and it was dry when we came in."

"Oh, it's nothing but the incoming tide," Miss Hurst said, lightly. "I am not afraid of wetting my boots a little."

As she spoke, she advanced toward the door of the little rock grotto, and then, even her own cheeks grew pale as she suddenly realized their situation.

For, rising far faster, than she had deemed possible, the waters had shut them in. Retreat was actually impossible. The waters were already more than knee deep over the path by which they had come—the only path by which they could return—and were rising with fearful rapidity.

Pale and tearful, Lilian clung to Ethelyn's arm.

"Ethel, Ethel!" she gasped hysterically. "What shall we do?"

And Ethelyn gathered the trembling young girl in her arms, with a piteous feeling that she was responsible for the horrible doom which was breaking over the bright young head.

In that one instant, it all came to her so plainly. She realized the awful waiting; the death wrapping them around in its cruel arms, that were each moment extended nearer and nearer to them; the moment of mortal agony; the last look out upon the world from their living coffin; and then the end of all. And Fred Westerly—he whom she had avoided, and yet lured on with such girlish coquetry; she would never see him again, and she so little thought, when she so laughingly denied him his good bye kiss a few days before that she would never have the opportunity to deny him again.

"Lillian," she whispered, and her brave voice quivered despite itself, "at least we can kneel down and pray, Let us try to remember, dear, that God is as much our God, and is as near, as if we were kneeling beside our beds at home."

And so these two young girls sank upon their knees among the white fringed foam at their feet: and white Evelyn's eyes were fixed wistfully upon the stars, which began to glimmer solemnly one by one, it flashed over her like a revelation what old Aunt Agatha had said—"Before the stars were thick in the sky again she should be face to face with death!"

How could Aunt Agatha have known?

"Come closer to me, Lilian, and put your arms about my neck. Don't let us be afraid—we must not be afraid, dear! We will just sit, and wait, and wait; and it is just like falling asleep, I have heard a score of times."

"But I'm afraid," Lilian sobbed—"I am afraid! It is a horrible death, and no one to know—no one—Hark!" and her voice rose to shrill expectancy, and she lifted her head like some brave young animal scenting danger from afar. "I thought I heard the sound of oars."

"No, dear. It was only the echo of the waves against the rock."

"But I am sure—I am sure—I heard a voice!" poor Lilian wailed.

"No, dear," Evelyn said, soothingly, with her upturned face as pale as an angel's. It could be no voice. I cannot remember my prayers, Lilian dear. All I can think of is, God be merciful to me a sinner. Lilian, say it—you say it, too—and He will be merciful."

And a few moments later, when the little boat, with Fred Westerly sitting on the seat, and pulling lustily at the oars, came plashing around the curve the two fair young girls were past all consciousness, and the salt spray was already beginning to sprinkle their white faces.

But they were saved—saved at last. Ten minutes more and it would have been to late. But Fred Westerly, who had been told in which direction the girls had gone, had been just in time.

And the first face which Evelyn Hurst saw, as her soul drifted back upon the boundless shores of time, was that of her lover, and from his face, with a heavenly smile upon her lips, she glanced to old Aunt Agatha, to whose cabin he had taken the two half-dead girls.

"Did I not say what was true?", the woman asked, as she met the gaze of the young girl's eyes. "You have stood face to face with death; but God was good and He did not let it conquer your brave young life. Good, not evil, will come of this."

And never again did Evelyn Hurst speak a harsh word to the poor and desolate, who are God's own, and whom He has set in our way to prove and try us.

It might have been a prophesy, it may have been a mere chance, but whichever it was, Evelyn Hurst did not disregard the strange, solemn lesson she had learned.

CHARCOAL SKETCHES.

Aunt Judy's Celestial Journey.

From the Texas Siftings.

A Southern summer night, lightened by the lustrous glow of golden moon which looked down upon a tiny garden at the back of a small cottage. There were other spectators besides the moon, who, standing on a high balcony overlooking the pretty bit of verdure, saw two negro women sitting in the back doorway of the cottage.

One of the women was quite young, the other very old. From beneath the wide frills of her white cap her gray hair bunched out in natural crimps, which no dampness could straighten, and a pair of silver-rimmed "specs" were kept in place by a black and greasy string, which passed over the cap. Her face was wrinkled beyond description, and her hands were hard, knobby and crooked.

"Yes, honey," the old woman was saying, "I'se been to heaven, sho. as you a livin' chile."

"How you come to go dere, Aunt Judy—wus you dead?"

"No, chile; I wus jes as live as I is this minit. You see, I wus er irenin' de white folks' close; I had a mighty big wash an' I had ir'ned an' ir'ned ontil I wus mos' ready ter drap. Well, all at wunst I hyeard a voice say, sarter low, 'Judy!' I never said nuthin', but I knowe I it wus de Lawd"—

"You knowed it wus de Lawd?" interrupted the younger woman.

"Uv cose I did," replied Aunt Judy.

"Is you done seen Him befo' dis time?" asked the other.

"No."

"Well, is yer ever hyeard His voice?"

"No; but I knowed it was de Lawd; and I says"—

"But I don't know how yer could er knowed"—

"Well, never you min'," said Aunt Judy, with some asperity; and, seeing the other was about to speak, she continued:

"Look hyer, gal, if yer gwyne to keep er axin' sech foolish queshchuns, I has no mo' ter say."

"Oh, Aunt Judy, doan stop. I wont say annudder word, 'deed I wont. Aunt Judy, please tell me the res'."

Thus mollified, Aunt Judy resumed: "Well, I knowed it was de Lawd—" a pause, during which Aunt Judy steadily fixed her eyes upon her companion. But if a doubt remained in the younger mind, it did not betray its presence by words or look or movement, and the narrator continued:

"I knowed pufieckly well; but I nuver said nothin'. Presently I hyeard it agin, a leetle louder, 'Judy! Judy!' but I kep on er irrenin', an' nuver answered. Den I hyeard it yit the third time, sayin': 'Judy my little lam, an' den I says' sorter short: 'What yer want, Lawd?' and he says, 'Judy my little lam' come wid me; an' I says, 'I ain't got no time to come; I got white folks' close hyer terirne, an' I'm mighty busy.'

'An yit agin he says, 'Judy, my little lam', come wid me.' Well, I didn't hab no time ter go nowhars. I was er irenin' some dresses fer de young ladies an' dey was mighty perticklei work, an' it wus er gittin' late in de ebenin.' But de woice kep' on a callin' on well, at las' I says, 'Well Lawd I'll go' but I'm mighty busy; an' if I doan git dem close irned de white folks gwine ter git behin' me, sho.' Well, I come outen dis very do', an dar stood the Lawd, right on dat spot, an' he tuck me right in his arms and carried me straight up in the sky; an dere wus oll de angels in' sperrits ersingin' an' plyin' on dere harps. May be you think you seen fine close,' but you ain't you ain't nuver seen nothin' to de close dem angels had on. Dey dresses was floanced up ter de wais wid lace on em' an' big long white ribben sashes an' long har curlin down to dere heels, an' rings on dey fingers an' bracelets, an' brespin—you nuvver seen de like. Well, arter I stayed as long as I could, I said I had ter go back home an' do de white folks' work; an' de angels all said I mus' come gin' and I says, 'Thank ye, but I couldn't come very offen, kase I had so much to do' An' den de Lawd tuck me up an' fetch me home an' sot me down on dis very spot what I'm sittin' now. Well de irns wus hot, an' I tuck one of de white flounce dresses outen de basket to iern it—an' I 'clar, chile, 'fo' de Lawd, if dat dress didn't look as black as er pot after dem dresses I been a seenin' up yonder."

"Did you see any cullud folks up dar, Aunt Judy?"

"Is you crazy? Why de angels dat had de whitest skin, an' de finest close, an' de longest har, dey wus de sperrits uv de cullud folks. An' de white folks wusn't nothin' 'long side o' dem."

After which revelation the conference adjourned.

A Young Bride Crippled for Life.

The friends of Mr. D. O. Mills will regret to hear that his daughter, the bride of Whitelaw Reid, editor of the Tribune, has become afflicted with sciatic rheumatism to such a degree that she will be rendered a cripple for life. Mrs. Reid returned from Europe in ill health, and since her return she has not improved. The disease which has so seriously afflicted her is now not uncommon among young wives who have been delicately raised. The worst feature of the attack in Mrs. Reid's case is that it seems to be shortening of one of her limbs by the contraction of the muscles. Mr. Reid's niece is her constant companion, and everything possible is being done for his wife by skilled physicians, one of whom it is said almost despairs of restoring her to complete health.

What the Governor Knew.

Ex-Gov. Seymour's nephew tells how his uncle lives on a farm near Utica: "He takes an interest in all people about him. The farmers consult him about their family affairs and crops, and he constantly receives letters from all over the country about all kinds of affairs of the people as if he belonged to them. He is always ready to give a helping hand to any one that deserve it. To illustrate this: A story is told that a man coming into the city with a load of wood broke down on the Deerfield road, whom no one stopped to help or paid any attention to. Gov. Seymour came along and got out of his conveyance and helped him to fix up his wagon, gave him a strap from his own harness and sent him on his way. The man afterward said, 'I felt mighty mean, because I stole the wood from the governor.' But the joke of the affair is that Gov. Seymour knew all along that the wood had been stolen from him, but concluded that the man wanted it more than he did."

FARMERS' COLUMN.

Hints for Farmers.

Mr. J. Wallace Darrow remarks, in his Chatham Courier, that one of the most aggravating incidents in the farmer's life, is to find his wagons and tools borrowed and kept until broken or unfit for use.

Professor Osborn, of the Iowa Agricultural College, asserts, in the Homestead, that blackbirds, are great destroyers of May beetles.

There is a white willow growing at Stockbridge, Mass., which at four feet from the ground measures 22 feet in circumference, and extends its branches fifty feet in every direction. Tradition says it was brought from Connecticut, in 1807, by a traveler, who used it as a riding switch.

A writer in the Rural New Yorker truly says: It is an idle thing, to pinch and save and grind along, only "to buy more land, to raise more corn, to feed more hogs; so that you can buy still more land, to raise more corn, to feed more hogs," and so on, ad infinitum. Take comfort as you go along. Buy a sweet picture to hang even on a white-washed wall, to relieve its dreary monotony. It will do you more good than costly carpets and rich carving will in the cold winter of life. It was Thackeray who said, "In my childhood I wanted taffy. It was a shilling, and I did not have it. Now I have the shilling, but I do not want the taffy."

Gapes in young chickens are caused by a small worm that gets into a windpipe. It is supposed that the chickens pick it up from the grass in the yards where they are kept. The worm crawls into the windpipe and remains there, making the chickens gape or gasp in their attempt to breathe. If taken early, the chickens may be relieved by giving a pill of camphor about the size of a grain of wheat once a day. Also put camphor in their drinking water. In full-developed cases, the worms may be removed by thrusting a loop of horse hair down the windpipe, twisting it about, and then withdrawing it. A small feather is sometimes used in place of a horse hair.

Three Safe Apples to Plant.

From all parts of the central fruit district of the state of Iowa, we hear favorable reports of the condition of trees, and the fruitfulness of three well-known varieties of apple.

Duchess: Irrespective of wind, weather and soil, this pioneer of the desirable Russian apple presents its fruit offering on healthy trees. Of the fruit and its uses I need not speak, but a word as to its picking and handling may be useful. If carefully picked when nicely beginning to color, and packed in half bushel lath crates, it is marketable in almost limitless quantities. Our towns are usually badly supplied with summer cooking and eating apples at a price within the reach of ordinary consumers. Grocers dislike to handle them, as usually packed on account of the loss by rotting. It has lately been found that the Duchess picked early will ripen and color in the crates, and always prove profitable to the grower, middle man, and consumer.

Fameuse: This is also a sure tree in orchard and nursery, and rarely fails to give profitable crops on varied soils. As with the Duchess we have learned to pick it early, pack in new clean barrels, lay them on their side in the orchard under a shed with straw between and over the barrels, and wait for the time in November when eating apples of prime quality are scarce in the markets. With Yankee tact in marketing the Fameuse at this time brings a good price in quantities greater than we will be apt to have to market for the next twenty years. Handled in this way we have no apple from Michigan that will better suit the popular taste.

Roman Stem: From all parts of the central and southern district this old variety has stood the ordeal of the past winter, and it stood equally well the rough usage of the test winter of 1872-3. It has not only lived, but it bears good crops of what even Chas. Downing calls "very good" apples that keep with little loss through the winter. It is a fine tree in nursery and orchard. In addition to the merits named, yet I know of nurseries with not a specimen in the rows, and neighborhoods where only a stray tree here and there may be found. Why? The story is told that on account of its color its fruit is not marketable in competition with colored fruit.

On the Cedar, this tree in some sections has been largely planted, and the fruit, having become known has ready sale. The customer who tries a well-grown, well-sorted, and carefully packed barrel of Roman Stems one year, wants at least three barrels the next. In view of the good behavior of the tree we should attempt to educate our people to its use. Let us speak good words for the Roman Stem. How to Protect Seeds.

A Missouri farmer, writing to the Rural New Yorker, makes the following excellent suggestions in regard to the preservation of seeds: "I have saved my seed beans and peas for the last two years from the weevil by shelling out the seed and putting it in empty baking powder cans along with small bits of gum camphor. Before I tried this remedy I lost nearly all the seed I saved, but since then I have had no trouble, Three pieces the size of a bean are sufficient for a pint can—one in the bottom of the can, one in the middle, and one on top. By the way, I find these empty baking powder cans very handy and convenient for keeping seeds. I have a number, and by labeling them and having a shelf made to hold them, I find them very necessary, for by their means I can tell at a glance just what is in each can, and they keep the seeds dry and unexposed. A little care in saving them as fast as emptied, will prove quite convenient in saving seed and by taking pains always to save the best and earliest produce for seed one is sure of good, pure seed, besides saving considerable expense every year in purchasing what one might save with very little trouble."

Cooking Recipes.

GIFT LAYER CAKE.—Two cups of white sugar; one-half cup of butter; two and a half cups of flour; one cup of milk; two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and the whites of eight eggs; flavor with vanilla. For the filling take one cup of stoned raisins and one lemon, peeled; chop together; then add one-half cup of water and one cup of sugar.

ORANGE PYRAMID.—Cut the peel in six or eight equal pieces, making the incision from the stem downward; peel each piece down about half way; and bend it sharply to the right, leaving the peeled orange apparently in a cup, from which it is removed without much difficulty. Pile the oranges so prepared in a pyramad on a high fruit dish, and you have an elegant center-piece.

PRESSED VEAL.—Boil a beef tongue the day before it is used, and a like quantity of lean veal. Chop very fine. Season the tongue with pepper, powdered sweet herbs, a teaspoonful of mustard, a little nutmeg and cloves, a pinch of each; season the veal in like manner, with the addition of salt. Pack in alternate spoonfuls as irregularly as possible, in cups, bowls, or jars which have been well buttered. Press very hard as you go on, smooth the top and cover with melted butter. When this cools close the can, and keep in a cool, dry place. Turn out whole, or cut in thin slices for tea. It is a pretty and savory relish, garnished with parsley or the blanched tops of celery.

COTTAGE PUDDING.—One cup of sugar; half cup butter; one egg; one cup sweet milk; tablespoonful soda dissolved in milk; two teaspoonfuls cream tartar in the flour; three cups flour; half a teaspoonful extract of lemon. Sprinkle a little sugar over the top just before putting in the oven, bake in a small bread-pan, and when done cut in squares, and serve with sauce made of two tablespoonfuls butter, cup of sugar, tablefuls flour wet with a little cold water and stirred until like cream; add a pint of boiling water, let boil two or three minutes, stirring all the time. After taking from the fire add half teaspoonful lemon extract.

How to Make Inexpensive Curtains.

Many a pretty little home has one or more rooms with windows draped with simple cheese-cloth. Though inexpensive, the graceful folds of the creamy material keep out the glare of light and give a softer tone to everything in the apartment. It is a pleasant thought that the same talent which works out beautiful designs for our most elegant furnishings is also employed to give grace and beauty to more common things. We find the exquisite patterns of the most expensive materials repeated in cheaper goods, so that even though a person have little money she may have pretty things. An exchange gives the following descriptions of some curtains suitable for a sitting-room or bed-room. The design originated in the New York art rooms. The curtains are inexpensive, the full cost for two deep windows being about $3.50. The materials required are two yards of cretonne, ten or twelve yards of cheese-cloth, and sufficient lace for finishing the front edges of the curtain and making an insertion across the top of each. Be careful in purchasing the cheese-cloth to get a piece which is evenly woven, and without black threads. Scrym may be used instead of cheese-cloth, if preferred, but it is more expensive. In buying the cretonne, get two patterns which harmonize, buying one yard of each. Cut each yard in four pieces, lengthwise. Each curtain has two of these pieces at the top, with an insertion of lace between. One curtain only will be described. Take one piece of each pattern of cretonne, stitch the lace insertion between them, turn down the edge about an inch of the one intended for the top of the curtain, and stitch the cheese cloth on the other piece with a pudding-bag seam. Make a hem twelve inches deep on the bottom of the curtain. The lace for the curtains should be about four inches wide. Lay the lace flat on the right side of the curtains an inch from the edge, with the straight edge of the lace toward the selvedge and the pointed edge turning backward. Stitch it on, fold down the hem on the wrong side and catch it fast with long stiches. Cut a V-shaped piece out of the lace at the lower corner of the curtain, seam the lace together and sew it across the bottom of the curtain.

Another effective way of making curtains of this kind, and perhaps still less expensive, is this: About the same amount of cheese cloth is required, some two or three yards of cretonne. The cretonne should be a pretty stripe, that which will divide into strips is the best width for the stripes. A hem eight inches deep is turned up on the right side of the curtain. Lay a strip of the cretonne across, so that it just covers the raw edge. Baste this on finely, and finish each side of it with fans of three long stitches worked in worsted about an inch and a half apart. The bottom of the curtain is finished with a fringe eight inches deep, made of coarse Dexter cotton. To make the fringe, cut four of the cotton sixteen inches long, double them evenly together; with a heavy crochet needle make a hole in the cheese cloth at the bottom of the hem, and draw the loop through; bring the ends up through the loop and pull them down. These should be about an inch apart across the curtain. A straight piece is made to go on the curtains at the top. It consists of a band of the cretonne with a hem on each side of the cheese-cloth. The cretonne is held by worsted, the same as on the bottom of the curtain, and the lower hem is finished with the fringe. Hems, the width given, are what would be required for large windows, if the windows are low they should be narrower. The curtains should hang straight, and the fringe should just clear the floor. A very good imitation of stained glass may be had by using Madras muslins. They are now printed with copies from cathedral windows, where geometrical figures and picturesque patterns are produced in full reds, purple, various shades of olive green, blue and yellow and somber brown and gray. The resemblance to stained glass when this muslin is tightly stretched across the window frame is deceiving.

A Most Mysterious Adventure.

The American brig Mary Celeste, which sailed from New York was the ship which met with a remarkable adventure a few years ago. A British merchantman sailing the Mediterranean saw her a few miles away, with every sail set, and behaving so that it was evident something was wrong. The merchantman bore down upon the brig, and receiving no reply to her hail, boarded the craft. The sails were, as stated, all set; the tiller was lashed fast; every rope above and below was in place; the fire was burning quietly in the galley; the dinner, untasted and scarcely cold, was ready; the cargo was intact, the pumps dry; the log, written up to within a couple of hours of the discovery, showed that she hailed from Boston; the boats were all in place; a child's toys were scattered over the cabin floor, and a piece of a woman's dress was still under the needle of the sewing machine; there was no lock of hair or drop of blood or disrangement of deck or cabin to indicate a struggle; but no one living or dead, was there. To this day the disappearance of the captain, with his wife and child and crew is a mystery, and the owners of the brig never have been able to frame a theory explaining this, one of the strangest events of the strange happenings upon the sea.

The fire in Pillsbury & Hubbard's elevator, Barnesville, was by great effort put out by the citizens. It was perfectly calm, hence the fire did not spread. The fire caught at the top, and is generally regarded as the work of incendiaries. The damage will be only about $100; no insurance.

FATHER PROUT.

[The death of Father Prout called forth a great number of "in memoriam" tributes, among the best of them the following, which appeared so long ago that it is now as good as new:]

In deep dejection, but with affection,
  I often think of those pleasant times,
In the days of Fraser, ere I touched a razor,
  How I read and reveled in thy racy rhymes;
When in wine and wassail, to thee were vassal,
Of "Water Grass Hill," O renowned "F. P."—
  May "The Bells of Shandon"
  Toll blithe and bland on
The pleasant waters of thy memory.

Full many a ditty, both wise and witty,
  In this social city have heard since then—
(With the glass before me, how the dreams come o'er me
  Of those attic suppers, and those vanished men!)
But no song hath woken, whether sung or spoken,
Or hath left a token of such joy in me,
  As "The Bells of Shandon"
  That sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the River Lee.

The songs melodious, which—a new Harmodius—
"Young Ireland—wreathed round its rebel sword,
With their deep vibrations and aspirations,
  Fling a glorious madness o'er the festive board;
But to me seems sweeter the melodious meter
Of the simple lyric that we owe to thee—
  Of "The Bells of Shandon"
  That sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the River Lee.

There's a grave that rises on thy sward, Devizes,
  Where Moore lies sleeping from his land afar;
And a white stone flashes o'er Goldsmith's ashes
  In the quiet cloister of Temple Bar;
So, where'er thou sleepest, with a love that's deepest
Shall thy land remember thy sweet song and thee,
  While "The Bells of Shandon"
  Shall sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the River Lee.

SO NEARLY WON.

The carriage was just turning the corner of the drive where the tall evergreens grow thickest, the final shower of rice and the last old satin slipper were falling far behind it, when James Grafton realized for the first time that Lettie had gone indeed, and had left him alone and unprotected. For him the bright June day seemed suddenly overclouded, and his own little domestic world strangely empty in spite of the merry, chattering groups of bridal guests on his sunny lawn. In another instant the carriage had disappeared, the bridesmaids and their attendant swains turned laughingly away, and sauntered off mostly in couples, for one wedding is very provocative of another, few things being more infectious than love-making.

James Grafton went toward his house with a very grave face (he had been standing on the path that he might see the carriage to the very last), and on the doorstep met his two sisters-in-law, Mrs. Charles and Mrs. Harry, both widows, and arrayed in different shades of iron-gray silk. It was awful to have to face them alone without that good, kind, brave Lettie, who had hitherto looked so well after him and his interests, who had always stood between him and the widows. They seemed to have come fearfully near to him all at once. Were they going to crush him completely? Would they eat him up and pick his bones? What would they do to him?

James Grafton was a bachelor of forty, or thereabout. Lettie, his only sister, whom he had a couple of hours ago most unselfishly given away to Col. Rathbone at the little white church at the foot of the hill, although many years younger than himself, had always fought his domestic battles for him and been quite equal to the task of defending him from any number of aggressive relatives. And James Grafton needed a protector badly, for he was the only man of his family who had ever made any money; while his brothers, after trying hard to ruin him as well as themselves, had died penniless, leaving him thirteen nephews and nieces to care for as well as two widows, whose only jointures were a couple of very different but, to James Grafton, equally objectionable tempers. A heavy burden, truly; but he and Lettie had taken it up bravely and cheerfully, and had done very much more than their duty.

But now James Grafton has given Lettie away; she was gone, and the widows were standing on the doorsteps, saying all sorts of pretty things about the pretty wedding and charming bride. There was a great blank where Lettie had been. Oh, then, surely the widows and the thirteen children could fill it! Everything his friends said brought this thought to James Grafton's mind; but that only made the blank look blanker. Mrs. Charles and Mrs. Harry did not love each other. How could they, being the mothers of two rival clans of children? "That woman" was the term by which the one indicated the other in a general way, but to-day, as each tried to excel the other in doing the honors of James Grafton's very picturesque little house, no one except the keenest observer could have told that a pen war raged permanently between the two smiling ladies who received so graciously the parting congratulations of the wedding guests. James Grafton, however, knew the state of affairs only too well, and as he watched the groups on the lawn thinning, and carriage after carriage driving off, his heart sank down and down, and the blackness of night settled upon him.

At length all had departed except the sisters-in-law and their older children. Mrs. Charles at once began to explore the house, which, during Lettie's reign, she had never been able to do quite to her heart's content; and Mrs. Harry followed her stealthily about, as a detective might watch a suspected thief. As for James Grafton he groped his melancholy way into his library.

"Ha! what's this?" he exclaimed with sudden joy as his eye fell upon a note lying upon his desk. "From Lettie! Dear girl! How thoughtful!" He eagerly tore open the envelope. It already appeared to him as if she had been gone centuries. The note had been scrawled in desperate haste and excitement, but it brought hope and courage with it. "My dearest old Jim," it ran, "be firm now or you are lost forever. I see they don't mean to go. They must go both of them. Keep to our arrangement. Don't yield an inch. You dear lamb, how I grieve to leave you so defenseless! If you value my piece of mind speak to Eunice Bell to-morrow, and know your fate. She likes you; I am sure of it. I am fond of her; so are you. Perhaps you think you are not; but I tell you—you are. How happy I should be if I could only feel you were in good hands. Believe me dear, she is a most sweet thing—with fondest love, your own Lettie." James Grafton had always had a fair and rather delicate complexion. It was not much the worse for wear. It turned a vivid scarlet as he read the last part of his sister's note.

"How on earth could she have guessed? What have I said or done to suggest such an idea? 'Believe me, dear, she is a most sweet thing.' I know that well enough without Lettie's telling me. 'I am fond of her; so are you.'" And in spite of having lost a first love "whom the angels call Lenore," or some other delicious name, James Grafton, this bachelor of forty years, sighed with almost youthful fervor for his second. "She likes you; I am sure of it." Aye, there's the rub! "Likes—likes—likes me," he repeated, "but, perhaps, loves some one else on the other side of the world. Does she? Why shouldn't I know?"

He read Lettie's note through again; it was singularly inspiriting; never before had the case been put before him so clearly; never had he dared, even in his inmost thoughts, to put it so clearly to himself. He opened his eyes widely.

"Have I been a fool, I wonder? I must have been, or I should have ——." But here he was roughly interrupted. Mrs. Charles' girls and Mrs. Harry's boys, who always had the greatest contempt for each other, had come to blows, and now burst into the library crying and sobbing, and making the house resound with their clamorous demands for instant justice. The mothers, who had been harrying each other until frail human nature could stand it no longer, rushed to the rescue. The noise became terrific. Mrs. Charles demanded the immediate expulsion of "that woman and her ill-mannered children." Mrs. Harry returned the compliment with vigor. James Grafton, unused to such scenes, fled in dismay. They followed him to the shrubbery, and when they had driven him thence, they tracked him to the poultry yard, where, rendered desperate by sheer despair, he turned upon them and declared he would not re-enter the house until both had left it. There was something so resolute in the way in which he sat down on some logs by the pump, as if he would stay there forever sooner than yield, that, knowing further resistance was useless, the widows departed. For many hours afterward James Grafton felt that he was the greatest brute in the world. He was, as regarded women and children, a most tender-hearted creature. He hated himself for his harshness; it made him feel degraded and unworthy even to woo so sweet a being as Eunice Bell. It was far in the next day before his self-respect returned.

James Grafton's house was pleasantly situated on the slope of a hill, not many miles from London. Eunice Bell lived with a married sister in Tuliptree lane, within an easy walk of the bachelor's residence. James Grafton being on intimate terms with the family, knew, as indeed all the neighborhood knew, that about two years ago Miss Bell had been engaged to be married. Then there had been a quarrel, and estrangement. He, the lover, had gone abroad; she—why one day she caught sight of her own face in the looking-glass, and repeated to herself:

> Charlotte, when she saw her lover
> Borne before her on a shutter,
> Like a well conducted person,
> Went on cutting bread and butter.

Other people said she went on living the same simple, helpful, beautiful life that she always had lived.

There was a difference to her in the aspect of things, doubtless; but if there were she never made others feel it. But now that broken romance was all over. But there are some events which never recede into the past; they live forever in a perpetual now, although one may agree with one's self to behave as if they had never occurred.

Now, James Grafton had had a broken romance of his own in early life. Gentle death had taken his "Lenore," leaving a wound in his heart which, although deep, had no bitterness in it. So it had healed very fairly; it was deference to Miss Bell's feelings, not his own, that had kept him silent hitherto, for in truth he was very much in love with her, and had been for some time past. James Grafton had promised to dine in Tulip-tree lane the day after his sister's wedding. He read Lettie's note over three times before he started.

"It's that 'likes' that makes me hesitate," he said to himself, as he began to descend the hillside by a broad highway. "Or, perhaps," he ventured to hope presently, "perhaps the 'like' was only Lettie's modest way of putting 'loves.' Lettie was always so modest. Yes, yes, it may be so; but no! it won't do. I'm a fool for thinking so." And his thoughts recurred to that other time when he had asked his Lenore what he now wanted to ask Eunice Bell.

The other time—ah! then he had been young, impetuous, madly in love. Then he had had no need to ask himself questions; then he only had been too sure. Now, going down to the house where Eunice Bell lived, he was full of doubts and fears and hesitations. "Yet, why not?" he asked himself, as he turned the corner into Tulip-tree lane.

He had grown very fond of that lane. As he turned the well-known corner, it was to him as if he were in the presence of a familiar friend and counselor; it was as if he had asked, "Yet why not?" to some one else than himself. And everything in the lane seemed to hush his forebodings, and say with a curious, all-pervading soothingness, "Why doubt."

Beyond the low hedges there were miles and miles of smiling, undulating English landscape, full of infinite calm and gentleness. How it happened I cannot say; but as James Grafton walked soberly through the lane, all hesitation fled away, and his face grew as restful as his heart had suddenly become. And was not that kindly face, with its strange and winning touch of purity, one which a good woman could hardly fail to love? The inevitable young couple who haunt the lane passed him; he did not covet their happiness, as he had often done; he was too happy himself. A turn of the road showed him the house where Eunice Bell lived; a large, old-fashioned house, dignified but home-like. From the lawn rose a stately cedar. Beside the dark cedar was a great tulip tree covered with pale blossoms. The voices of children at play reached him from behind the old red wall of the garden. With them came—Ah! what was that? Her voice. James Grafton felt his pulse quicken as he hastened his steps toward the house. In fancy he saw her out there under the tree, the guardian of the little group of children. Propitious moment! Now if he could but seize it! And eagerly, as if for the first time in his life, he hurried on to meet his fate—his fate at that very moment was rushing how surely, how swiftly, to meet him!

* * * * * *

While James Grafton had been coming through the lane, the object of his affections, Eunice Bell, had been sitting, just as he had imagined and as he had often seen her, within the shadow of the great trees. She was dressed for dinner, in a half-toilet of some soft dove-colored, summer-like fabric. She was ten years younger than James Grafton, although for the last two years she had considered herself distinctly an old maid. Her hair was soft and fair; her figure tall and slight—a little too slight, perhaps. Her face was very placid. At the moment James Grafton had turned into the lane it was grave as well as placid. Presently (was it because she knew by the striking of the church clock he must be coming nearer?) a thought made her smile. She was thinking of James Grafton then; telling herself she liked him, feeling that, somehow or another, the idea of being always an old maid was imperceptibly melting. "Is it only friendship just touched with sentiment, or does he really care for me?" The question pleased her, but she knew the answer perfectly well; she knew he cared for her. Then she sighed; her lips half curled with scorn, but not scorn for him. No one (except his sisters-in-law) could regard James Grafton with anything but profound respect. "Rest, truthfulness and love! Ah! I have sometimes thought them idle words; but to see the smile of this good man is to know"—

She never finished the sentence.

"Auntie! auntie! see, there's Mr. Grafton," a little voice cried gleefully; and Eunice Bell, raising her eyes, which had been fixed on the grass at her feet, saw James Grafton crossing the lawn, and the children all scampering toward him as fast as their chubby legs could carry them. Eunice rose and followed them, laughing gently at the earnestness with which the little things rifled his pockets of those sweets which a many-nephewed-and-nieced man is never without if he knows his duty and does it.

So then, Eunice and James (after all, forty is not so very great an age), they were both laughing when they met. It was very pleasant, very pleasant—in fact quite delightful; but, somehow, before that gentle domestic laughter sentiment fled abashed. They were out in the garden one quarter of an hour—one bright, delicious quarter of an hour. They sat side by side under the trees while the evening sunbeams played upon the softly fluttering leaves. The children prattled about their knees. Their glances met with kind, familiar smiles. Eunice felt a contented restfulness in his presence, and he was conscious that it was so. It was to him a most golden, blissful quarter of an hour. But of course he could not say what he wished before the children, and there was all the beautiful long evening before them, and no need to hurry. Presently, after sunset, he and she would stroll out there, and then he felt certain now, absolutely sure, that she would answer yes—as absolutely sure as I am at this minute that he had asked her to be his wife during that happy quarter of an hour she would have accepted him with the frankest smile of perfect trust. The gong sounded for dinner. They sauntered up to the house side by side, the children still playing about their path.

"I always feel whenever I come here that you have all attained the ideal state of domestic peace and happiness," said James Grafton, thoughtfully. "After the stormy scenes one is sometimes called upon to witness" (he thought of yesterday and the sisters-in-law), "the sweet, calm atmosphere pervading the entire home life here is most soothing."

"We get on very well together," said Eunice in her soft, placid voice.

"Your sister and her husband are, I think, the most admirable young couple I ever met. They never wrangle. By they way, I haven't asked how they were. How are they?"

"Oh, as flourishing as usual," returned Eunice. "I wonder they haven't been in the garden. They generally like to be out here during the children's half hour, as we call the half hour before dinner."

So saying, they entered the house together—that house the bachelor had now for some time held so sacred. They entered by the drawing room window, which opened on the lawn. They rather surprised Mrs. Cathcart, the young and lovely wife, diligently reading a novel on the sofa, and her gallant husband, apparently absorbed in the evening paper, immediately behind her. They were, in fact, back to back. And this was the more remarkable, as the honeymoon ways of this charming couple had often been a subject of comment among their friends. They were both reading so diligently that Mr. Grafton and Miss Bell had quite time enough to take in the coup d'œil and its meaning before either husband or wife moved. A moment after Cathcart sprang up blithely to meet his guests, as if he were intensely relieved by the interruption of a threatening tete-a-tete.

"You are a good fellow to turn up after the awful affair of yesterday. I'm sure I wonder you survived it," he exclaimed, nearly wrenching the bachelor's hand off.

"I'm sure I wonder how it's been done," returned Grafton.

"Weddings are such a sell," growled the young married man, as James Grafton turned to the sofa and expressed a fervent hope that his hostess was quite well.

"Dreadful headache; nearly frantic with it!" said Mrs. Cathcart, knitting her pretty brows and rising, pressing one hand to her forehead as she did.

There had been times, and those distant but a few brief hours ago, when such words and such a movement of pain would have wrung her husband's heart, and his "My darling! what can I do for it?" would have sounded perfectly agonizing; now the wretched being only turned abruptly to his sister-in-law with, "Eunice; dinner's late enough already," and marched on with her huffily.

"I am sorry you are so unwell. The day has been oppressive. You will be glad to get down to the seaside, won't you?" said James Grafton as he gave his arm to the too evidently snubbed wife.

"I shall be glad to get away somewhere. I'm sure I don't care where it is. I want change terribly," said Mrs. Cathcart, with a certain hardness of tone in her voice that her guest had never before observed.

"Do you know, I always admire your dining room so much," put in the bachelor as they entered the room.

"There's a perfect hideous glare on it just now," retorted Mrs. Cathcart.

"And your decorations are charming—these trailing bits of briony and wild"——

"Don't agree with you, Grafton. I'm sick of seeing the place littered with weeds," interpolated Cathcart, the young married man, with an angry sniff, as they took their seats at the table. "John," he exclaimed, turning to the servant, "see that there's something decent out of the conservatory in the center of the table to-morrow—something at least three feet high and bushy."

John, as he went about his work with imperturbable gravity, remembered with great inward mirth that only a few days before he had been ordered to remove a tall fern, because, as his master had said, it hid his wife's face. "Rum 'uns, married folks, ain't they?" he remarked to himself. Ah, indeed they are, especially when young, good looking and very much in love with each other! But their "rum"-ness, O, worthy John, strange as it is, is nothing to their utter want of consideration for other people's feelings.

What James Grafton and Eunice Bell suffered at that little square dinner I really have not the heart to relate in detail; and, indeed, there is but small need that I should do so, for have not you and I taken a melancholy part in many only too similar scenes? I could, however, forgive the young couple for their conduct during dinner; but what I consider absolutely brutal and unpardonable was that although I feel certain both Capt. and Miss Cathcart knew that James Grafton would have enjoyed a quiet stroll about the grounds when the sun was setting (for of course he was on a certain subject as easy for them to read as the morning paper), yet these two selfish married creatures, absorbed only in the interesting game of irritating each other, hung on to the two unmarried ones the whole evening, with a relentless malice that is perfectly unattainable except by a husband and wife who are, for the time being, not on speaking terms.

After dinner, Mrs. Cathcart, by way of pretending she did not care, rattled off her gayest dance music and sang dozens of her brightest songs; but nothing would please her except to have Eunice quite close to her, turning over the pages. Once, indeed, Miss Bell ventured as far as the window, but she was speedily captured; a sisterly arm being gently but firmly placed around her waist, while a plaintive voice murmured in her ear: "Ah, Eunice! a sister's affection—love—is, after all, the only thing in the world one can really depend upon!"

And while this was going on in the drawing room Cathcart had effectually button-holed Grafton, and was confiding to him that as his domestic life had suffered an utter collapse he intended—indeed, it was his only chance of saving his life and reason—he intended to exchange with Hutchings, and go and seek glory and, he devoutly hoped, death in South Africa.

But the most wretched evening must at last come to an end. About 10 o'clock James Grafton again found himself in Tulip-tree lane; but instead of the happy calm of a few hours earlier, he now feels as if he had been assisting at an earthquake. He was quite dazed, and unable to contemplate anything at all except the extraordinary ways of married people, at which he gazed, so to speak, with mingled wonder, terror and anger. Should he ever be able to re-enter that house, that desecrated sanctuary?

It was, however, a sweet, peaceful night, so that by the time he had so far recovered himself as to see that it was his bounden duty to rescue Eunice Bell from—good heavens! it was maddening to think what she might be enduring that very minute. He entered his house as soon as he had made up his mind, while taking an extra stroll or two in front of it, that nothing should hinder him from going over to Tulip-tree lane the first thing in the morning and taking circumstances firmly in hand.

Now one might get along fairly if one had merely to deal with the circumstances that properly belong to a case, if it were not for the collateral circumstances that are always lying in ambush on both sides of our path, ready to spring out and eat both us and our case. James Grafton found a letter and a telegram awaiting him. He tore open the telegram; it was from Mrs Harry. Her youngest child had been suddenly seized with croup. James must come at once and bring a physician with him. James went at once and took a physician with him. On his way down he read the letter which, recognizing Mrs. Charles' only too well-known hand, he had thrust hastily into his pocket. Mrs. Charles wrote to him regularly every day. On one day she called him a good angel, the next a demon; it was the turn for being a demon now. He was so entirely upset by one thing and another that he quite believed what she said, which was not what he did very often. Mrs. Harry's child's croup turned out to be something far less terrible, but duty kept him with her for some days. At length, however, he was again walking down Tulip-tree lane, thinking that this time no domestic complication should prevent him having his say, when who should he meet but Mr. and Mrs. Cathcart arm in arm, conversing with most lover-like actions on a subject that any one could see was deep, interesting and amusing.

They looked so lover-like that James Grafton almost hesitated to approach them, but Mrs. Cathcart espied him.

"Oh, Mr. Grafton, what do you think has happened?" she asked, laughing in the brightest and most charming way, and looking very much excited. "Why, really we are all so delighted about it—why, Eunice's old sweetheart has come back, and it was all a mistake, and he's the finest fellow in the world, and they're going to be married at once, and they're as happy, as happy, as happy"—and she looked at her husband and rapidly nodded her head up and down—"as happy, very nearly, as we are! What do you think of that, Mr. Grafton?"

A Frank Opinion of Jay Gould.

New York Times: Old Commodore Vanderbilt had an uncommonly good knowledge of men. He was a keen reader of faces. By his skill in physiognomy and aptness in some other matters he accumulated a fortune of $100,000,000. Here is what he said of Mr. Jay Gould, in a public card, written on the 26th of November, 1872:

"I have had but one business transaction with Mr. Gould in my life. In July, 1868, I sold him a lot of stock, for which he paid me, and the privilege of a call for a further lot, which he also settled. Since then I have had nothing to do with him in any way whatever, nor do I mean ever to have unless it be to defend myself. I have besides always advised all my friends to have nothing to do with him in any business transaction. I came to this conclusion after taking particular notice of his countenance."

Gentlemen who now have, or intend to have, business transactions with Mr. Gould should ponder the wise old commodore's words.

Mahone's Commission.

"I don't believe," said and old army officer in Washington the other evening, "that Senator Mahone has the faintest idea where his commission as brigadier in the confederate army is. I captured his wagon train one day. They brought me a wagon said to be his personal property, in the military sense of the word. In it were a peck and a half of corn and a grip-sack. The latter held a brand-new confederate brigadier's uniform and Mahone's commission as a brigadier general in the army of the confederate States of America. I gave the corn to my horse, the uniform to my little servant, whom it fitted to a nicety, and some day I'm going to give the commission to Mahone. It's in my desk now."

THY LOVE.

It brightens all the cruel gloom
That closes round me like a tomb,
And fills my heart with summer bloom.

It makes me quite forget the pain
That grief has wrought within my brain,
And brings a flash of joy again.

It makes the darkest night to me
More clear than ever day can be,
For in my dreams I am with thee.

A STUDY IN SPASMS.

[With anger.]
I refused his outrageous request
  For a kiss—which I took him to task for;
[With greater anger.]
And he said—the mean thing—'twas a jest!
[With only conscientious anger.]
I refused his outrageous request—
[With faltering argumentative anger
He's offended, and—I—DON'T fear lest
  Another he never will ask for!
[More in sorrow than in anger.]
I refused his outrageous request
  For a kiss—which I took him to task for

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

How Beauty and Grace May Be Acquired.

NEW YORK,-Special Correspondence, June 20.—I attended a reception last night at the house of one of New York's merchant princes, and in the person of my handsome, brilliant and thoroughly happy-looking hostess I recognized, or rather failed to recognize, an old schoolmate, who, on account of her awkward and unkempt appearance, used to be shunned by all. Positively I never beheld such a complete transformation. Ten years ago the lady who last night attracted so many admiring eyes was a coarse-complexioned, round-shouldered school-girl, big of hand, heavy of foot, and well-nigh shapeless in figure. She greeted me cordially, and, perhaps in acknowledgment of the exclamation points in my eyes, she asked me to call on her this morning. I of course went, and after finding a cosy seat in her dressy little dressing room, gave vent to a part of my astonishment in the words:

"Well, Laura, I don't know you. I'll have to make your acquaintance over again. Don't tell me it's the effect of time. Time don't work such changes as this. You look like a new creature!"

The lovely Laura leaned back in her chair and smiled. "I have a great notion to tell you all about it," she said.

"I wish you would."

"Well, then I will. You know what I used to be at sixteen? Ugly as sin and a burden to myself and every one else. I used to be miserable in those days. I wanted to be bright and charming and have some points of beauty, as every other girl had. It's all very well to say that handsome is that handsome does, but as a rule if a girl does not feel that she is looking well she doesn't feel like behaving well. Sometimes I would read a little moral book that told me if I would exercise every day and be very good tempered I would be far more pleasing than if I were a regular beauty. I used to hate that book. It lied so awfully. I knew there were plenty of people—washerwomen, plowmen and others—who took plenty of exercise, and were generally good natured. Of course, health is the important factor. A human being, like a machine, has got to be in the best running order before it is good for much. You see I felt just about desperate about my own case. I determined at last to take my personal defects one by one, do the best I could to cure them, and then, whether I succeeded or failed, I meant never to worry about them again. I started out with my complexion. Now, you know, one's complexion is rather a complex affair. It is red or pale according to your circulation; it is pimply and greasy, or beautifully transparent, according to the state of your digestion; it is clean or cloudy according to the frequency and thoroughness of your baths; it is brilliant or faded as you go out in the sun every day or not; it is fresh and kissable or poisonous and abominable according to whether you use powder and paint or not."

"Then would you advise the discontinuance of every sort of cosmetic?"

"Indeed I would. There is not one that cannot easily be detected, and they betoken falsity and pretense in the character. One would think that a fortune in counterfeit money would be just as attractive to a man as a made-up woman. Fancy a pink and white two-year-old baby with powder on its face! Well, a woman ought to be as pure and sweet and sincere as a child, and she would be just as loveable."

"But about this sunshine," I protested. "One doesn't want to get all tanned and freckled up."

"Certainly not, and to avoid that danger you should take a sun bath every day. Many women take a nap in a darkened room every afternoon. Instead of that throw a thick doubled quilt in front of a window where the sun is shining strongly, and lie down without a vestige of clothing on, and with a wet towel and a broad hat on the head. Ten minutes at a time will be enough to start with, and you can increase the time gradually until you are able to endure the direct rays of the sun for a full hour. Then you will find that you never had so much color in your cheeks and sparkle in your eyes before. This is one of the luxuries of my life. Beside this, I always take a good warm bath daily, finishing off with a dash of cold water over the entire surface, and adding the final touches with a couple of rough towels. My face is washed with hot water night and morning and dried with as little friction as possible. This is to ward off wrinkles. Then I never use tea or coffee, very seldom eat meat or "made dishes" and am particularly careful what I eat in the evening. On rising and retiring I usually take a dozen deep breaths at the window, so that my lungs may have a little more exercise than they can get inside of a corset."

"But how did you improve your figure so much?"

"O, that!"—and she sprang to her feet, displaying a lithe, straight form, well rounded with flesh,—that was achieved by determination and persistance in gymnastics. I found out just what exercises would develop the chest, and I went to work and developed it. Precisely the same process increased the size of my arms, and my heavy, bungling tread was got rid of in this way: Standing with my feet near together, I raise myself upon my toes, and then drop slowly back again. This process is repeated fifty or a hundred times every morning and evening, and there is no exercise that will make the step so light and springy. As for my hands, I soak them in warm water before going to bed, and then rub in all the glycerine they will absorb. I used to wear thimbles on my fingers and thumbs all night long until they were tapered sufficiently. With my hair I never did much except to brush it. Hair that is well brushed, like corn that is well cultivated, is almost sure to grow fast and look fine. There, I believe I have told you all. Acquired beauty is not nearly so rare a thing as the inherited article, but I believe it is more permanent, because those who work for it generally know how to take care of it.

Stylish Jewelry.

The show windows of the great jewelry houses are an artistic delight. One notices that glove bracelets are very narrow, and have the knife-blade edge. A pair of these set in pearls of contrasting color and a diamond speck glittering at the top of each pearl is much valued. Others are set with brilliant stars, or with sapphires, rubies, emeralds, or the lustrous tourmaline or cat's-eye. A flexible bracelet made of small squares of satin-finished gold is unique. In each square alternating with a diamond is set a jacinth, a pink sapphire, green garnet, pink tourmaline and hyacinth. Ear rings are seen mostly in ball shape of dead gold, paven with small diamonds or relieved with filigrees. Alexandrites, green by day, and shifting into red by night, are set with tiny brilliants, and highly prized by brunettes. Wonderful effects are produced by the application of chemistry to jewelers' work, which gives to the glint of gold an artistic harmony to suit the enamel or the gem. This luxuriance of color adds greatly to the effect of modern jewelry. The marquise ring, the jewelers say, is no longer the highest fashion. Cluster rings in the shape of the antique circle of gems is newer. Of this kind there are three rings which may be worn together; each is set with five stones; one of sapphires, one of rubies, and one of brilliants. A sudden caprice of fashion demands opals, the only stone, it is said, that cannot be counterfeited. A large "fire" opal, set between two diamonds, is the handsomest ring at present shown. A "cabochon" ruby has about it a circle of fine brilliants. A blue topaz from Africa, or a flame topaz from Switzerland, or the blue-green Alexandrites, though less valuable, are treasured very highly. After a short oblivion pendants are returning to favor. They seem to have retired for a year, only to come out in renewed splendor. A golden rose, the leaves set with brilliants, or a massive square Greek cross set with "off-color" pearls and diamonds, are most highly valued. An outgrowth from the costume balls and dinners has been that at several London dinner parties ladies have appeared with their heads in a kind of fancy dress, the costume otherwise being such as is usually worn at dinner parties. A very pretty brunette from Vienna, with dark hair and languishing eyes, disguised her head as a fairy; to do this she wore a wig of curling fair hair, with a tiara of diamonds and a long veil of beaded net. The transformation was a great success. Another lady, a fair-haired American girl, had numbers of stars glistening amongst her curls, and her head was covered with a veil of black tulle, laminated with silver and fastened in place by a crescent moon. A dark-haired lady had her hair arranged in two long plaits, falling on her shoulders, and a shopka of brocade studdied with jewels conquettishly placed on her head, which was partially veiled by a transparent yashmak. The Neapolitan magnosa fastened in with small gold pins, and accompanied by ear-rings to correspond and a coral necklace, formed a most becoming Roman coiffure.

London Club Theatricals.

"The Marquis de Massa's 'Paris-Auteuil' is a syllabub," says London Truth, "concocted for the Cercle de la Rue Royale. It was whipped into a froth in the presence of the clubbists and their wives and lady friends by Mmes. Judic and Reichemberg. The sweet-voiced warbler of the Varietes was, for the nonce, a milkmaid at Auteuil. Her farm there was a little Eden. As she performed in the strong light of Carcel lamps, real flowers were used to decorate the stage and to adorn the proscenium. In the second act a vista was afforded of the race course of Auteuil. Mme. Judic changed her costume thrice. She began as a dairymaid, then became the Marquise de Faublas, and last appeared as Isabelle, the ci devant jockey club flower girl. Mme. (or Mlle.) Reichemberg personated "La Societe des Steeplechases." She was smartly dressed in a short buttercup satin skirt, which was intended to serve as a Byzantine ground to the picture of a jockey clearing an Irish fence. The tunic was in vivid pink. A chemisette of pearl network half concealed the bust, which, being rather thin, requires concealment. A little green cutaway vest and a yellow jockey cap stuck on the side of the head gave a sporting character to the toilet. The boots were of the buttercup shade of the satin skirt.

The piece wound up with a revue ballet of Excelsior Eden. Gentlemen here were as ladies, and vice versa. Ugalde, as a St. Cyr student, was the stage manager, and sang out her orders in a strident voice. The Dukeling Morny, whose head has been turned by his success as a lady killer in New York, was the leading danseuse. He thought it would be more fun to leave his mustache intact than to shave it off. Had it not been for that sign of masculinity he would have been a decidedly pretty blonde. His obliging friend, Prince Murat, who appeared with him as mourner at the Feyghine obsequies, acted a mute part in the review. He was a bookmaker, and at home in his role. The dukeling was in flesh-colored tights, four or five short petticoats of tarlatan and a plaid silk bodice much decolletee. His golden hair was well curled a la Titus. There was no pirouette or pas too difficult for his grace to execute. Mlle. Laus was half jealous of his feminine success.

Handsome Hindoos.

The women of Calcutta, says a correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle, are, as a rule, very beautiful, in so far as one can reconcile beauty with the olive complexion, but fade rapidly after reaching the age of maturity. It is not unfrequently that one sees women at the age of twenty-five with furrowed jowl and crow's feet visibly encroaching the corners of their large, lustrous black eyes, and at the age of thirty many have a decided stoop and decrepit gait, as if old age had laid the vandal hand heavily upon their shoulders. The decline is rapid, and within the space of five years we behold a form, whereupon beauty had loved to sit enthroned, now ravished by the merciless grip of decay. Not old age, however, for this early decline is due to two causes: the very early and tender age at which nuptials are performed, and the destructive influences of the climate. Barring that relic of barbarism, the nose ring, there is no creature more comely, more lovable, than a "Mem Sahib" of Bengal between the ages of 13 and 18. Cleanliness is their constant care, which is a virtue to begin with. A figure somewhat below the medium height, and unhampered by corset or weighty skirt, and arrayed in a loose-flowing robe of white, the upper portion of which is thrown carelessly over the left shoulder, exposing to view the swelling bust and well rounded arm. The upper portion of the body is encased in a sleeveless jacket, generally of some brilliant color, and tastefully worked with silver or gold and silver thread. The arm is bare from shoulder to wrist, save a goodly portion of the wrist, which is encircled by many bands of either silver or gold. The lower part of the ample robe is drawn tightly over the hips and looped at the left side, much after the manner of the entrance to a circus tent, defining boldly the contour of a faultless figure. These ladies, in the matter of stockings, are not desultory, as they wear no shoes, and consequently no stockings, and little of the ankle is visible between the borders of their robe and the curiously little mirrored toe-rings and resonant ankles.

Night Robes of Silk.

Chicago Herald: The advent, or rather revival, of the Mother Hubbard has produced an entire revolution in the night-dress business, and now every first-class house carries a stock of æsthetic bed robes. These novelties are made of some crushable silk, usually a figure, and consists of a deep square yoke, to which the full straight pieces are gathered. The sleeves are full and short—provided the arm is pretty—the bottom finished with a deep hem and the front closed with flat buttons and hooked down the skirt. Some individual ideas show a yoke and sleeve of heavy net run with silk darning. A charming toilet of this description was made last week for a recent bride. The material used was a pretty slate silk. When made up the neck and cuffs were finished with ball-fringe and the yoke closed with a number of small, odd cuff-buttons. Summer silks of plain or figured patterns are often used for night-dresses, and besides doing good service cost nothing but the making. In picking up silk night-gowns it is not necessary to have the whole dress of the same material. In crystal gray or black silk gowns the yoke is not infrequently incrusted with white or black jet, when the buttons are obtained by plundering a gentleman's jewel case for odd shirt buttons. The beauty of these æsthetic gowns is the economy by which they are frequently worn as robes de chambre or sometimes utilized for wrappers. Brides who delight in having the honeymoon conducted with royal extravagance wear white silk gowns, elaborated with white crystal or some fine embroidery. Occasionally the yoke and skirt are braided in white or true blue. Where such elegance is not compatible with finances, pretty foulards or French cambric may be used with less expense and similar effect to all but the little woman, who, it must be acknowledged, will find no substitute to assuage the loss of a real silk nightgown. If the lady is a young bride she will assume a white ground flecked with love-red roses, passion flowers or tiny marriage bells. If trying to the complexion, they are sometimes made instead in a princess, with Watteau back, and have pocket, cuffs and collar trimmed with same color to match the figure and relieve the neck, with a large Alsacian bow of becoming color.

A Handsome Dinner Table.

What a pretty thing a well-set table is, and how much goes to its completion. Every housekeeper knows that and is aware what immense service is rendered to the cause by the posession of cunning little ornaments and appurtenances, as valuable in their way as the "plate" which is the pride of her heart. How much, too, the very foundation of the matter has to do with it, the snowy table linen, the napkins tastily arranged, the fresh flowers and lustrous glass. As regards the table linen many fashions have had temporary sway within the last few years, dating, indeed, back to the perfection of the machinery which has so entirely superseded the spinning wheel and hand loom that house linen ceases to be the product of household industry. But underlying fashion is still the inherited love of snowy-white damask, not to be extinguished even by the æsthetic love of tone, although for a while it had considerable influence, which is still traceable in the cream colored drapery to be found in our midst. A little while ago the height of the fashion consisted in the introduction of color, and those who "go the whole length" had insertions of colored plush in the center and squares of the same material as a bordering for table cloths. Colored and figured stripes, too, were popular and still are so for the tea cloth, but not in the best families for the dinner table. Another innovation consisted in trimming the table cloth with lace insertion and edging, and decorating the table napkins to match, a fashion which is still popular, but not likely to become usual. Most of the decorated cloths, that is, those with colored borderings, come from Germany. Usually the tones of color are in three combinations—black, old gold and red; or blue and old gold; red and old gold, and they are finished off with knotted fringe. Plain white momie table cloths have all openwork bordering instead of a colored one, which is entirely done by hand, and could only be the product of a country where labor was cheap, as it is in Germany. Some of the energetic housekeepers of America undertake the decoration of their table cloths themselves, but they are few in number. Napkins to correspond have borderings of drawn work and fringed-out edges. Then there is yet another variety which is popular in the broche cloths, which have usually a handsome bordering of colored embroidery and knotted fringe. With so many to choose from the modern housekeeper has quite a difficulty in making a selection, but spite of all these novelties, the demand for handsome Irish damask has not lessened.

Dressing in Brazil.

In some parts of Brazil the shoe is a visible sign of a man's rank, only a free negro wearing the sapato, while the slave walks barefoot. With gentlemen of North Brazil the favorite and most stylish mode of dress consists of a black broadcloth coat, white linen pants and tall silk hat. The vest is often discarded, and so the showy watch chain dangles across the breast of the coat. When walking, a gentleman tucks his large handkerchief closely inside his collar, leaving the corners outside the coat, and thus preserves some of the glossy appearance of his linen. The cuffs are also very conspicuous, as they are made very large and allowed to slip so far below the long coat-sleeve that the knuckles of the hand frequently disappear, in spite of the continual act of the wearer stretching out his arm to its full length in the vain endeavor to leave the hand more free for action, and expose to view the enormous seal ring that is so universally worn by the upper classes. Shopkeepers seldom wear coats, and in a great majority of cases the vest, too, is wanting. Among the commonest out-of-door laborers the only clothing is a hat and pair of pants, while the washerwomen ply their trade in nothing but a calico petticoat. The genteel ladies of Brazil follow Paris fashions in dressing, though but few of them ever wear bonnets. Many of them have very beautiful hair, which they arrange in becoming styles and decorate with natural flowers, which are most frequently placed by all classes just above the ear, like a busy clerk's pen. This fashion is, of course, much more convenient for those dark-hued ladies whose short wool makes the ear the only safe resting place for a flower, but ladies with beautiful hair choose to place the flower where the delicate petals will brush the swarthy cheek. In North Brazil there are no professional dressmakers. The finest ladies usually make their own wretchedly fitting costumes, and the most of a lady's wardrobe is purchased at home from the ever-present peddlers walking about the streets of every city in the empire.

Cheap Curtains.

A very stylish and graceful design for sitting-room or bedroom curtains recently originated in the New York art rooms, and full directions are given here for making a pair. The curtains are inexpensive, the full cost for two deep windows being about $3.50. The materials required are about two yards of cretonne, ten or twelve yards of cheese-cloth, and sufficient lace for finishing the front edges of the curtains and making an insertion across the top of each. Be careful in purchasing the cheese-cloth to get a piece which is evenly woven, and without black threads. Scrym may be used instead of cheese-cloth, if preferred, but it is more expensive. In buying the cretonne, get two patterns which harmonize, buying one yard of each. Cut each yard in four places, lengthwise. Each curtain has two of these pieces at the top, with an insertion of lace between. One curtain only will be described. Take one piece of each pattern of cretonne, stitch the lace insertion between them, turn down the edge about an inch of the one intended for the top of the curtain, and stitch the cheese cloth on the other piece with a pudding-bag seam. Make a hem twelve inches deep on the bottom of the curtain. The lace for the curtain should be about four inches wide. Lay the lace flat on the right side of the curtains, an inch from the edge, with straight edge of the lace toward the selvedge and the pointed edge turning backward. Stitch it on, fold down the hem on the wrong side and catch it fast with the long stitches. Cut a V-shaped piece out of the lace at the lower corner of the curtain, seam the lace together and sew it across the bottom of the curtain.

Oval vs. Round Waists.

The more closely a woman can get her bust to approximate to the shape of a peg-top the prouder and happier she usually is. Why the peg-top has attained to the high distinction of serving as a model for woman is one of the many puzzles connected with dress. The Greeks—who certainly knew something about the human form—assigned to their ideal waist dimensions quite intolerable to the English woman of to-day. Moreover, they made it oval, whereas the modern waist is round. It is a physiological fact that there is about an oval waist a delightful suppleness and elasticity, while the round waist so common at the present day is hard, rigid, and unsympathetic. The fact is that some women are blessed with waists naturally small, and oval as every natural waist is, while other women less favored by nature are determined to outdo the smallness at no matter what cost. But no discriminating critic can ever fail to perceive the difference between natural and artificial smallness. Perhaps if this were better understood women would cease to ruin their health and weaken the muscles of their backs by going about in a tight-fitting cuirass, event at the risk of appearing to depart conspicuously from woman's ordinary dress. They would then find that some other problems, such as distribution of weight, would settle themselves without much difficulty.

Household Hints.

The ingenious woman without much money, who is constantly on the lookout for some way by which she may brighten her home at small expense, and who, by the way, is to be met almost everywhere, should read this: Take your old black walnut or ebony stand and have it nicely dressed with oil or varnish, as best befits its lost estate: then have a piece of wood cut out the same shape as the top of the stand, whether square or round, but not of the same size; leave a margin of one or two inches all around; cover this extra top with plush (the plush may be pasted, glued or put on with mucilage); then glue this to the top of the table. This is a very pretty addition, and any ornament set on this plush-covered stand shows to excellent advantage.

An appetizing pudding is made of two lemons, two eggs, and two cups of sugar, and four tablespoonfuls of corn starch dissolved in a little cold water. After this is dissolved, stir it in two cups of boiling water: then add the beaten yolks of the eggs with the juice of the two lemons and a little of the grated peel; lastly, stir in the sugar, put this in a pudding dish and let it bake for half an hour. If the oven is hot, this will be a long enough time. Then draw to the edge of the oven, and spread over the top of the pudding the whites of the two eggs: beat them to a froth, with a heaping tablespoonful of sugar added. Let this brown for two or three minutes. This pudding is full as nice when cold as when warm.

It seems to be an unknown fact to most of our domestic assistants that platters and vegetable dishes are sure to crack sooner or later if they are set on the hot stove. If they are left there a moment only there is danger of their good looks being spoiled. It is a good plan to have something on or near the stove where such dishes may be placed; of course if one has a shelf above her range or stove, there is no excuse for the annoyance mentioned above, but if there is no shelf, a brick may be kept in the heater and used when it is necessary, or an iron flat-iron holder will be found useful.

One of the simplest and best ways by which light-colored kid gloves can be cleaned is this: Put the gloves on your hands, take an old and very soft linen handkerchief, wet it in sweet milk, and rub it on a piece of white soap—castile or any toilet soap will answer the purpose—then apply to the soiled parts of the glove: do this until the spots disappear: then wet the entire glove and pull it and stretch and rub until it is dry. If you are faithful it will not dry in wrinkles. One word of caution should be added to the above: Lavender colored kid gloves cannot be cleaned in this way, as they will fade and look spotted.

Shelves are a necessity in a summer cottage where tables do not abound. These may be manufactured by almost any woman. Pieces of dry goods boxes will do for the shelf; iron brackets, that cost but a trifle, and are strong, can be purchased before you leave home. If this shelf is in the sitting-room, for an ornamental lambrequin, if your surroundings are extremely simple and plain, brown paper, or white, or cream-colored holland may be used, and this may be gayly decorated by pinning or catching with needle and thread some of the wild vines that are found in the woods, or ferns may be pressed for this purpose, and a border made of them.

Pineapple prepared in this way is delicious with ice cream or without it: Grate the pineapple, after removing every particle of the peel, or chop it; it must be minced so fine that any one eating it will be in doubt as to the method of its preparation; add sufficient sugar to sweeten it; let it stew gently until it is soft. When it is prepared thus it can be eaten by many who are obliged to refuse it uncooked on account of its producing indigestion.

A new and handsome way to trim the edge of a satin pin cushion is to get a ribbon of the same shade as the cushion cover, gather it just full enough to have it ruffle a little; sew it around the cushion and put a silk cord over the seam. This is also a good way to finish the bottoms of the satin-covered bottles which accompany the toilet cushion.

Parsley makes such a cheap and excellent garnish for all kinds of meat and fowls, and is such a decided addition to the dressing for roast lamb and for potato salad, that it should be in every garden. It is not too late to plant the seeds now. It grows rapidly. It is nice as a flavoring for soups when barley is used.

Delicate white muffins are made of one cup of sweet milk, the well-beaten whites of two eggs, two and a half cups of flour, one heaping teaspoonful of baking powder, a piece of butter the size of an egg. Bake in a quick oven.

A pretty fancy is to ornament the broad silver knife used to cut the bride's loaf at the wedding. Make a pretty bow with long ends of white ottoman ribbon, about an inch and a half wide.

Flour may be used instead of corn starch in lemon jelly for the filling of layer cakes. Stir all the lumps out and use a little more, say one-third more, than you would of corn starch.

Foibles of Fashion.

Close-fitting pelerines, high on the shoulders, are of late fashion. Some are cut straight around, but the most stylish are those with the back width let in long, and the fronts tied loosely and trimmed with a mass of lace and ribbon. The high shoulders are usually fulled in. To make these capes sit closely to the shoulders—a matter which has been a study to the modiste—an elastic, fastened to the sides, is passed under the arms, and when the arms are fixed to your sides like those of a wooden soldier, and it becomes a sheer impossibility for you to even brush away a fly which is investigating the anatomy of your ear, your cape is certain to be in excellent proportions, and has, without doubt, the proper "set."

There seems to be no end to the variety of high-priced, high-toned, high-colored parasols. A large-sized one, opened to private view from among a multitude just imported, was made of strawberry satin, trimmed to the depth of twelve inches with three rows of bright gold lace. The ferule was surrounded with a wreath of brilliant flowers, showing gold and dark red poppies; bright blue ragged sailors, and dark green leaves. The lining was of gold-colored satin, with a hand-painted Greenaway design executed on one of the panels. Loud as this was in style, it was positively quiet and plain compared with many of the other sunshades exhibited.

Among the many novelties in the way of wraps for watering place use are Louis XVI. pelisses of Chinese silk, which, in common with other novelties, will have its votaries and detractors. The garment is most becoming and appropriate to tall, slender figures, and is generally chosen in pale nun's gray or ecru shades. The light washing silk of which these pelisses are made has one great advantage—the dust does not adhere to it; so that, if desired, brighter shades may be selected (of which there are many, deep red among the rest) without fear of the color being dimmed by a long, dusty ride.

Sleeveless jackets and bodices open, square, or heart shape, and made of embroidered velvet, brocade, or of gros-grain silk in pale blue, mauve, or shrimp pink, hand-painted, and edged with lace, will be very fashionably worn over evening dresses of white lace, embroidered muslin, veiling, batiste, and other light fabrics. A number of these little sleeveless affairs, which can be made with a yard and a half of material or less, are pretty and inexpensive, supplying a decided change in the appearance of the same white dress. With plenty of ribbons matching each jacket, to fasten upon the skirts, the effect is quite magical.

Among the most elegant toilets for afternoon wear are glace silks and foulards in pompadour and old chintz patterns, made up over thin silk or batiste skirts. The sash and ribbon trimmings worn with these match the hues of the chintz or brocade. The designs and colorings of these materials successfully rival the more expensive silken tissues. Shot silks are also fashionable, and make up handsomely in combination with plain silks and satins, broches and velvets, plain and figured.

The bouffant skirt is surely gaining ground in America, but it is a matter of congratulation that the crinoline proper is kept in abeyance. It is true that many of the otherwise best-dressed ladies wear the tournure, but instead of rampant steel, they content themselves with box-pleated folds of very stiff muslin or crinolette, fastened low on the inside of the dress skirt in the back. It is considered exceedingly bad taste to wear the tournure high up to the waist.

The pretty shoulder cape for summer use, to be made of goods matching the dress, just covers the shoulders, comes down in front to the belt, and from thence the sash ends are carried to the back and tied or simply crossed and fastened with a knot of ribbons or a pin. Both cape and sash ends are edged with a ruffle of Oriental lace, which launders the best of all the fancy laces except Torchon.

The Chinese and Japanese styles of head-dress are in high vogue among ultra-fashionable women, and the stars and heads of the pins they use to thrust through the top-knots are often studded with diamonds, rubies and pearls of rare value.

A suggestion of silver throughout an entire black costume gives a beautiful and uncommon effect to this somber dress. This combination is charming in "half" mourning.

Flowers are extravagantly used on dressy bonnets and hats of every description.

The new plaided zephyrs make jaunty tennis costumes.

THE REGISTER AT YOSEMITE.

An Interesting Monument to the Vanity and Inanity of American Travelers—Hayes and Garfield and the Grand Duke of Alexis Among the Scribblers.

Yosemite Letter to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat: Pedestrians and equestrians alike all turn to the bath houses on these warm afternoons, and down by the meadows there is a luxurious establishment where everything, even to arnica, court-plaster and buttons, are provided for weary humanity. Connected with the bath house is a bar and billiard room, the whole establishment presided over by an æsthetic soul named Utter. In the corner of the bar room is a giant register book, weighing over 100 pounds, and thousands of visitors, including even Mr. and Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes, have signed their names in the midst of such intemperate surroundings. Among the first to enter his name in the great book was Count Alexis de Perwinoff of Moscow, better known to us as the Grand Duke. The noble Russian expresses himself after this manner in the column of remarks: "I can dare say that, during all my young life, I never had any better bath than at this place. Our Russian friends will find that it beats every one of our bathing accommodations, and for the liquer there would be too little place in this small page to describe." Any number of funny and commonplace remarks are scattered through the book, and strange to discover, no visitor has yet fallen back on Lord Byron to help him out with his opinion of the scenery. The bent is toward Hebrew poetry, and half of the Psalms may be found in scattered verses through the book. President Garfield wrote: "No one can thoughtfully study this valley and its surroundings without being broader-minded thereafter;" and the hero-worshiping crowds affect to find something very grand and profound in this prim, copy-book sentence. The Garfield autograph was written May 15, 1875, but last summer two vain fools came along and interlined their cognomens of Schramm and Winkler on either side of "James A. Garfield." They sought notoriety and immortality, and they have it; as every one who reads, vents their opinion of these two vandals respectively from Mentor and congress, in the State of Ohio. Superlatives and exclamation points are chief in the column of remarks. One man growls, another swears, and hundreds sound the praises of the "Yosemite cobblers," the "mountaineers," the "Bridal Veil juleps," and the "El Capitan cocktails" that are dispensed from the high counter across the room. A man from Sydney, Australia, wrote: "I find America the dirtiest country of the world, and wish most earnestly that I was safely back in my native land." An Irishman follows him with: "The Americans wash once a month, by their own confession." A native inscribes himself with this: "The view from 'Oh My! Point' is grand. Eastern tourists especially think it grand, because it is cheap." Jack Harkaway writes:

  Yosemite I love thee! but
    Thou 'rt a sad deceiver,
  For when I reached the valley
    I had the chills and fever.

The Rev. Joseph Cook, who made himself much disliked in the valley, wrote what he called his Yosemite Doxology:

  The hills of God support the skies;
  To God let adoration rise.
  Let hills and skies and heavenly host
  Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

Many funnier things used to be written in the visitors' books, "befo' the wah," as they might say in the South, and in Mr. Hutchings' registers, which date from 1859, innumerable quips are found. One thing that I remember is the solemn screed of two Bostonians. One donkey took the old quill pen and wrote: "I this day name the heights to the right of the Yosemite fall, 'Nevins' heights,' in honor of my father, David Nevins, of Boston, Mass." His companion followed with another: "I this day name the heights to the left of the Yosemite fall, 'Milton heights,' in honor of my father, Thomas Slocum Milton, of Boston, Mass." And then came a ginius, who seized the pen and wrote.

  Ye gods, to think such witless wights
  Should with such names damn noble heights.

Although the heights are not yet generally known as Nevins' and Milton's Heights, a regiment of people have laughed over the filial dedications, and applauded the rhymer who followed them.

SPRING.

For those who note the fate of earthly things
There lurks a sadness in the April air,
A dreamy sense of what the future brings
To things too good, too hopeful, and too fair.
The spring brings greenness to the recent grave,
But brings no solace to the mourning heart;
Nor will its rustling and its piping save
A single pang to him who must depart.
The ivy bloom is full of humming bees;
The linnets whistle in the leaves on high;
Around the stems of all the orchard trees
In flaky heaps the fallen blossoms lie;
But every leaf upon each new-clad tree
Tells of but boundless mutability.

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

From and after July 1, no saloon licenses can be legally granted in Illinois for less than $500 a year for the sale of spirituous liquors, or less than $150 a year for the sale of fermented beverages. These are minimun rates but local authorities can increase, the amounts if they see fit.

The civil service commissioners propose to give women a fair chance. Chief Examiner Lyman says that if the heads of the departments request that women shall be certified, they will be, but otherwise sex will be disregarded in the certifications, and if a woman passes as good an examination as a man she will enter the lists on the same terms. It will be left to the cabinet officers to decide whether or not they will employ women, and it is known that they generally prefer men, but as far as the civil service commission is concerned there will be no partiality.

Statistics recently collected at the Eastern Pennsylvania show that of 780 young men received their under 21 years of age 755 had no trades. There was plenty of education among them, as 572 were graduates of schools. Such startling figures as these are an unanswerable argument in favor of manual-training schools. They show that our public schools are turning out boys who are not prepared for any occupation or any form of useful manual labor, and that mere book-education is no protection to society against crime. These boys, unfitted for any kind of manual work, naturally drift into the easiest occupations they can find, and there is nothing easier than drifting into no occupation, and thence into crime.

British justice is unsparing, and the condemnation of Dr. Gallagher, Wilson, Whitehead and Curtin to penal servitive for life may be an effective warning to persons who contemplate a mission to England as participators in a dynamite conspiracy. The guilt of the four men appears to be unquestionable, and the swiftness of their trial should provoke no adverse criticism. English courts always reach swift conclusions in the cases of heinous offenders, and this work is far more satisfactory than that of American courts in which trials are drawn out to the length of the Star Route case. The certainty and celerity of British justice is a sure preventive of lynch law, which has become so common in America as scarcely to excite much remark. For certain classes of crimes lynch law is considered, in many localities, the proper administration of justice. All this is owing to the faulty administration of laws which are amply sufficient to cover nearly every case. The popular distrust of judges and jurors is to be lamented, but the remedy is in the hands of the people who believe in law and order. The evils of lynch law can be avoided by a stern determination to hold judicial officers responsible for allowing criminals to escape merited punishment upon any pretense whatever.

There is a larger class of people in this ree country—larger than many suppose—who destrust, fear and hate popular institutions and would be glad to have them changed so as to place all the issues of life and prevents, that are subject of legal determination, in the hands of a favored few. This class is now howling for the abolition of the sacred right of trial by jury, for no other alleged reason that a few much regretted acquittals and mistrials. They say trial by jury is an old, effete institution and should be replaced by some latter day invention, because it does not accomplish its object. Granting all this, because it is not convenient to argue the question, such people as are honest in their prejudices against juries, might be asked whether the Christian religion has accomplished its object, and what population of the human race live up to its teachings? If the one, a human institution, and subject to human defects, should he repudited, why not the other. But it is not worth while to argue the matter. We have right among us scores of aristocratic dudes who boldly advise the abrogation of one of the most sacred monuments of freeman. Let them be spotted, whether high or low, as enemies of their country and of its republican institutions, and warned that their unholy machinations, will be resirted to the death.

One of the curious if not unaccountable incidents of commerce is the importation ef articles of food from abroad that can be raised in endless profusion at home. A few months ago it was a surprise to learn that many thousand bushels of potatoes were received from Ireland and sold at a profit, that onions and cabbages from Bermunda filled the markets of New York. And now we have the statement that two New York firms have in the last nine months imported over 200,000 dozen eggs from Europe, mostly from Denmark, Germany and France, though some were from Italy and even from Turkey. It may be interesting to know that a large proportion of these eggs are bought by shop-keepers in Massachusetts and connecticut, who may of course be depended upon to swear that they are fresh-laid. The importation of eggs, is nothing new, but the European trade is of recent growth. Our chief source of supply, beside the domestic. is the Dominion; the maritime provinces ship great quantities to Boston and in fine condition. The importation for 1882 amounted to 12,000,009 dozen, valued at $1,800,000. It really seems as if things were out of joint when such a vast agricultural country as the United States ceases to raise certain products in sufficient quantities to supply the demand. Probably plenty of money and laziness have a good deal to do with this problem.

Comparatively little interest seems to be taken in the remaining star route cases and the proceedings in Judge Wylie's court Saturday attracted very few spectators. After some preliminaries, the case of ex-Senator Kellog was postponed to next Saturday, and bail was accepted for Mr. Brady in the sum of $20,000, or $10,000 under each indictment. Mr. Ker was on hand for the government, A. B. Williams for Brady, and Nathaniel Wilson for Kellogg.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

Washington Special: Senator Sabin of Minnesota had an interview with the president regarding the consolidation of internal revenue districts. He entered a very earnest protest against any reduction in Minnesota. The president maintained complete silence as to the scheme of consolidation, but stated very positively that a general reduction of districts would take place. He said there was no need of so many districts, and that in the course of a few years they would all be wiped out of existence. He anticipates the abolition of the whole internal revenue system. Senator Sabin very strongly urged the retention of the Minnesota districts as they now are, and is hopeful that no change will be made. It has been reported, however, that the two Minnesota districts will, be consolidated into one, with head-quarters at St. Paul.

The secretary of war will soon put in force the scheme of retrenchment necessitated by the reduced appropriation made by congress for the fiscal year, beginning July 1, which is about $1,000,000 less than for the past twelve months. It will become necessary to put down the quartermaster's depots in various places. The depots will not be abolished, but the horses and wagons will be cut off, and the local teamsters will be relied on for transportation.

The president has appointed Capt. S. L. Phelps, District of Columbia, minister to Peru, and Richard Gibbs of New York to Bolivia. These appointments were made necessary by the resignation of Patridge and the return to the United States of Manly, who is ill and unable to remain at his post.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

The recent election of N. K. Fairbanks of Chicago to the direction of the Chicago & Northwestern company, in place of David Dows, resigned, reinforces the faction in the company in favor of making a dividend. Mr. Dowe and President Keep have both fought against any division of the Northwestern's surplus. Mr. Fairbanks, whose stock cost him not far from 140, it is reported, warmly favors the division.

The Northern Pacific directors authorized President Villard to announce a dividend on preferred stock after the exact amount of net earnings for the fiscal year have been determined.

At Plymouth, Mass., George W. Humphreys recovered $10,500 damages against the Old Colony railroad company for injuries caused by the abrupt stoppage of a train.

Congressmen are making desperate efforts to prevent the reduction of internal revenue offices, but it is said the president will not yield.

The formal opening of the completed Northern Pacific will take place in September at the Mullan tunnel.

GENERAL NEWS NOTES.

Duluth Herald: George Groundy fell in love with a buxom grass widow, and his amour resulted in marriage. The widow's husband had left her sometime before and gone to California and she has never since heard aught of his whereabouts. Groundy lived with his new wife until after a child was born, when he, under the advice of a friend skipped out and deserted her. He returned after about a year's absence and the couple again lived together, apparently happy. However this may be, another child was born to them and when it was a few months old, about a year ago, the woman decided to do a little running away herself. This she did, and she did not show up again until a few days ago, when Mr. and Mrs. Groundy were again united together.

At Dallas, Tex., G. W. Russ sues Count Telfner, of Italy, president of New York, Texas & Mexican railroad, and son-in-law of Bonanza Mackay. Russ claims that he sold defendant 2,250,000 acres of grazing land in El Paso county for 80 cents per acre, to be paid for Nov. 5, 1882, and that Telfner failed to meet his obligation. The purchase was for the purpose of establishing a gigantic stock ranch, in which several European capitalists were concerned, with the intention or organizing a line of steamers and suppying European markets with Texas meats.

A monument erected by the women o Kershaw county, S. C., in memory of the confederate dead, was dedicated on the 20th with a grand military demonstration, in which twenty companies participated. Senators Hampton and Butler, Gov. Thompson and other distinguished men were present. The ceremonies of unveiling consisted of an artillary salute, dedication prayers, ode and memorial oration by Senator Hampton.

The schedules of assignment of Thaddeus Davids, and David E. Davids, the New York ink manufacturers, show liabilities $172,788 of which nearly $150,000 is due on note signed or endorsed by George W. Davids (who recently committed suicide) in the name of the firm and without the knowledge of his associates. The nominal assets are $195,363; actual value, $74,150.

The entire Philadelphia congressional delegation is in Washington, for the purpose of protesting against the threatened temporary closing of the League island navy yard. They want to know why they should be discriminated against in favor of yards of less importance.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

Kyle Walker and Harry Reid, both colored, arrested for supposed implication in the murder of young Trice, at Veto, Tennessee were released on Wednesday. Certain parties believing them guilty, investigated, found proof and arrested them. By threats, the fourteen-year-old son of Wisly Warren, who was lynched on Tuesday, was forced to disclose the particulars of the crime, which were substantiated by his mother. The goods and mule stolen were found in the places indicated, and Walker and Reid were taken Thursday night and lynched. They confessed fully before being hanged, but expressed no feelings of regret.

Sheriff Bogart has returned to Winona from Huron, Dak., with George L. Losy, the note forger, who had broken jail while the officer was waiting for a requisition, but was subsequently rearrested. Henry O'Neill of Huron, was the principal person in detecting Losy's whereabouts and causing his arrest. As the men were being taken from the train to the jail at Huron Losy turned on O'Neill and knocked him down, threatening to kill him if he got an opportunity.

J. P. Olds, Daniel Holder and John Lorague were arrested at Southbridge, Mass., on a charge of stealing large quantities of gold for the American Optical company. Olds was a respectable citizen, and had charge of the valuable stock. He was placed in the upper room of the factory in charge of employes. He jumped through the window, forty feet to the ground, swam the river and escaped to the woods.

A notorious thief from Chicago named William Johnson, was brought to Eau Claire, Wis., from Augusta, having stolen $250 in money and a lot of promissory notes from a farmer near that place. FOREIGN NEWS GOSSIP.

Floods have occurred in Silesia, attended by water spouts. A large part of the town of Hershburg was submerged, and the houses of adjacent villages were flooded The railway near Salesbrunn was washed away. A number of cattle perished. Dispatches from Breslau state during the last twenty-four hours of the rise of the river Neisse, at the town of that name has been most alarming, the water having reached the highest mark since 1829. The Evangelical school and church, two barracks and part of the postoffice are submerged. Disastrous floods are also reported in Bohemia and Moravia. The Danube is expected to overflow its banks shortly, as the river Inn and the mountain streams are rising rapidly. The quay at Linz is flooded.

Five men were killed recently at Curragh, Ireland, in a fight between North Mayo and Dublin militiamen. It originated in a gambling dispute, during which the Mayo men called the Dublin men "Careys" and "Invincibles." The fight lasted several hours, each sides using stones and firearms freely. The conflict was only quelled by officers threatening to fire upon the men. One of the men killed was Sergeant Monroe, the conservative candidate for parliament for Monaghan, against Healy. The latest report is that seventeen men were wounded and no one killed.

Randolph Churchill, in a written communicaion to Gladstone, stated that he would hand over to the latter historical documents to prove the khedive's complicity in the Alexandria massacre, if the prime minister would promise a full inquiry. Gladstone replied that in any step the government might take, the position of the khedive as ruler of Egypt would be duly regarded.

An extensive fire occurred the 20th in the Royal Dock harbor at Amsterdam. The man-of-war Daggerbank was destroyed, and the man-of-war Koltenau considerably damaged. The loss is between three and four million florins. The origin of the fire is unknown. One fireman was killed while trying to subdue the flames, and three others injured. The minister of marine visited the scene while the fire was in progress.

Rector Masser of the Vienna university made a speech in the diet recently, in which he spoke against the Germans, and in favor of the Czechs. Sixty-three out of the seventy-four professors of the university have signed a protest, denying that they sympathize with the views of the rector. Students have also shown their disapproval of his remarks, by a riotous demonstration against him.

An End Man to the Last.

Charles Backus, a famous negro minstrel died in New York on the 21st. of Bright's disease. He was the son of Dr. Backus, a New York physician, and born at Rochester, N. Y., in 1834. His family connections and antecedents were among the best in Western New York. It is related that when two or three days before his death Mr. Backus's physician informed him that his life was near an end, he said: "Oh, then, I'll be an end man to the last." He saw his wife weeping on one occasion, when he was undergoing an operation. He stopped the physician and, pointing to his wife, he said, "Doctor, what beats a good wife?" The doctor possibly never heard the old minstrel conundrum, and answered that he didn't know. "A bad husband," remarked Backus.

Emigration From Canada.

Washington Special: In ten months of the present fiscal year the Dominion of Canada has sent us 52,810 inhabitants. Of course the Canadian authorities have strenuously denied the accuracy of these figures. An attack on our bureau of statistics made recently by Sir Alexander Galt, led Mr. Nimmo to make a thorough investigation of the matter with the aid of a special agent. On the 23d he sent Secretary Folger a report of his investigation. Mr. Nimmo makes a complete vindication of his bureau, shows that Sir Alexander did not know what he was talking about, and proves that the published statistics of Canadian emigration to this country have been rather under than overstated.

An Important Life Insurance Decision.

The recent Minnesota Supreme court decision in the case of Annie D. Manson against the grand lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, is of interest to societies who incorporate a system of insurance upon the lives of their members or the use of beneficiaries named by the insured, said insurance fund being maintained by assessments upon the surviving members.

It appears that Mr. Manson was a member of the above order, and was behind in dues, but that there was a provision in its by-laws that the payment of the same within three months of the time after their due would restore a member to full rights and privileges in the insurance benefits of the order. Mr. Manson within this precribed time, handed his dues to the person appointed by the lodge to receive the membership assessments and dues in the street, but they were rendered back to him by the lodge and he refused to take them. On his death the above suit was brought, which caluminated in a judgment for the $2,000 benefits which as a member of the order, fulfilling the requirements of the by-laws, he was adjudged by the court to be legally entitled to. Decision of district court affirmed.

Ohio Politics.

The democratic state convention was held at Columbus on the 21st, amidst great enthusiasm. Judge Hoadley of Cincinnati was nominated for governor on the second ballot, his competitors being Gen. Ward, Geddes and Dunham. John G. Warwick of Stark county was nominated for Lieutenant Governor.

The work of making the ticket continued with the following results:

Supreme Judges—Short term, Martin D. Follett, Washington county; long term, Selwin Owen, Williams county.

Supreme Court Clerk—John D. Cruikshank, Miami.

Attorney General—James Lawrence, Cuyahoga.

Auditor of state—Emil Kriswe'ter, Franklin.

Treasurer of State—Peter Brady, Sandusky.

School Commission—Lercy D. Brown of Stark county.

Board of Public Works—John P. Martin of Green county.

Two Railroad Men Killed at Minneapolis.

An accident occurred on the Manitoba track between St. Paul and Minneapolis Wednesday afternoon, whereby two men lost their lives, and a third was badly injured. The Eastern or Chicago express of the Omaha, which reached St. Paul as 2:25 and left five minutes later for Minneapolis, was thrown off the track at University switch, two and a half miles out from Minneapolis. A misplaced switch was the cause. The two men killed were the engineer and baggageman, named respectively William Harrity and Melvin Roberts. The injured man was Charles Vandervoort, the brakeman. The accident was caused by the engineer of the train not seeing the danger signal that had been set before him. The engine turned on its side, but immediately afterwards righted itself. The engineer feeling his engine turning jumped from his box and in doing so was struck by the baggage car and hurled to death. The baggage man was in the car, and in trying to get out was caught between the door and jam and choked to death. Neither body was much mutilated. J. W. Cunningham was on the train at the time, but made a miraculous escape from instant death. He did not receive as much as a scratch.

INTERNAL REVENUE DISTRICTS.

Issuance of the President's Order Reducing the Number of Revenue Districts to Eighty-Two.

Washington Special: The new plan for the consolidation of internal revenue districts was finally approved on the 25 inst., by the president, after a protracted interview with the secretary of the treasury. The number of districts remains at eighty-two, coinciding with reductions proposed in the bill that passed the house last winter. It has not been determined in all cases where the new collectorships will be located. This will be a matter for future action by the commissioner of internal revenue. The new scheme will go into effect July 1, or as soon thereafter as practicable. The two Minnesota districts are consolidated, with William Bickel of St. Paul collector in charge of the new district. Albert C. Wedge of Albert Lea, collector of the First district is retired. In Wisconsin the four districts are reduced to two; Henry Harnden, collector of the Madison or Second district, and M. H. Ketchum, of the Fond du Lac or Third district being retired, leaving Irving M. Bean of Milwaukee, and Leonard Lotridge of Sparta in charge of the consolidated districts. The Iowa districts are reduced from four to three, the collectorship of the old Fifth district being abolished, resulting in the retirement of Collector Sampson P. Sherman of Des Moines. The Dakota and Nebraska districts are consolidated, resulting in the retirement of J. L. Pennington of Yankton and the retention of George W. Post of Omaha in charge of the consolidated districts. In detail, the changes in the Northwest are as follows:

Nebraska and Dakota—Those districts are consolidated into one district, and George W. Post designated as collector.

Minnesota—The first and second districts are consolidated under the name of the second district, with William Bickel, collector, who will probably be located at St. Paul.

Wisconsin—All east of the dividing line is to be known as the first district, with I. W. Bean collector whose headquarters will probably be in Milwaukee. All west of the dividing line is to be known as the second district, with Leonard Lotridge collector.

Iowa—The counties of Cedar, Clinton, Jackson, Jones, Linn, Muscatine, Scott, Louis, Washington, Johnson, Keokuk, Iowa, Benton, Mahaska, Poweshiek, Tama, Marion, Jasper, Warren, Polk, Madison Dallas, Adair, Guthrie, Case, Audubon, Pottawattomie, Shelby and Harrison are consolidated into one district, to be known as the Second, with John W. Green collector. All that portion of the state south of the counties named above is consolidated into one district, known as the Fourth district, with J. W. Burdett collector. This is a new appointment. All that portion of the state north of the counties named is consolidated into one district, known as the Third, with James B. Simpson collector.

Threatened Barb Wire War.

A large meeting of the barb wire manufacturers of the country, licensees of the firm of Washburn & Moen, Worcester, Mass., was held at the Tremont house, Chicago, throughout Thursday. Forty delegates, representing every state in the Union except California, were present. The discussion, of a private but important nature, was on the propriety of paying further royalty to the Washburn company for the privileges enjoyed by the licensees. This matter has come up for consideration in view of the conflicting decisions—on the one hand of Judges Blodgett and Drummond, of the Illinois court, and on the other, of Judges McCreary and Love, of Iowa. The old barb wire association, known as the Manufacturers' Equitable, is dead, and in the hands of a receiver, but it is not unlikely that the manufacturers will prepare to conserve the interests of their trade by the formation of a new association. The history of the grievance in brief is as follows: Some years ago a man in central Illinois invented a machine for twisting wire, which has become a very essential element in the manufacture of barbed-wire fences. A Massachusetts firm purchased the entire rights of the inventor, and have had for several years a monopoly of the patent twisters. The firm immediately refused the use of the machine to any other unless a large royalty were paid upon each machine used. Finally many establishments in the country became the licenses of the Massachussetts firm, and it was reaping an immense profit from the business. The licensees finally became tired of paying a large percentage of their profits in royalties, and about fifty suits have grown out of the trouble. These were generally decided in favor of the Worcester firm. Last week, however, the Massachusetts firm struck a snag in the adverse decision of a couple of Iowa courts, which held the patent to be invalid and the monopoly unwarranted. The oppressed concerns took courage at this and decided to make a formal organization and press the matter vigorously, until they get what they consider their rights.

Another Theatre Holocaust.

Intelligence of a frightful calamity at a place of amusement in Dervio on the shore of Lake Como, Italy has just been received. While the performance was in progress at the Puppet theater, the structure took fire and was destroyed. Forty-seven lost their lives and twelve others were injured. The show was in a large hall over a tavern. There were ninety person in the hall. A bengal light was used to represent fire, and sparks from this set fire to a quantity of straw and firewood in an adjoining room. On perceiving the flames the showman shouted "Fire!" but the spectators thought the cry was merely a realistic detail of the show, and remained seated. Cries of fire were soon raised outside the hall. The audience, thinking an affray had arisen in the street, barred with a heavy table the door leading from the hall. They did not discover their mistake until the flames burst into the room. After the fire was extinguished forty-seven charred corpses were found near the table, including the bodies of the showman and his wife. A large portion of the bodies are women and children. The wounded were hurt by leaping through the windows. A child was thrown out of the window by its mother and fell upon a pile of straw. There was only one spectator present in the hall not hurt.

NATHAN FORD'S ENTERPRISE.

Knabe by Telephone.

Several hundred of the prominent citizens of St. Paul had the unusual privilege of listening to the musical treat afforded by Mr. Titcomb's recital last Thursday evening through the telephone. The piano warerooms of Nathan Ford, at 97 East Third street, were connected by telephone with sixty-five residences in different parts of the city. The eagerness of those who received invitations to this telephonic treat to insure connection in time, showed their appreciation of the labor and enterprise of those having the matter in charge. Their assurance that the magnificent tones of the Knabe pianos retained their richness notwithstanding the many miles of metallic circuit, add another to the many laurels won by the Knabe this season.

Truly marvelous are the wonders of electricity, and the privileges conferred by its use multiply daily. It now becomes possible not only to order Knape pianos by telegraph but to listen to their tones at a distance of miles by telephone. Intending purchasers of "the best pianos made" can hereafter "ring for connection" with Mr. Ford's music store and select their pianos and order them sent to their residences without stepping outside their doors, for electricity in tones, like sunlight in photography, tells the truth.

Mr. Ford is to be congratulated on this latest enterprise of his, and the gratitude of the citizens of the northwest is daily manifesting itself by their actions.

County Surveyor Relf of Brainerd, who has been re-surveying in the northern part of Morrison county, says the government buildings at Fort Ripley are all falling down from decay. It is urged that these buildings should be sold so that the settlers in the neighborhood could buy them and convert them into substantial buildings on their farms.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

Minnesota State Medical Society.

The fifth annual meeting of the Minnesota Medical Society, was held at Minneapolis on Tuesday and Wednesday. The attendance was not so large as last year. Dr. R. L. McMurdy of Minneapolis made the welcoming address.

The president Dr. Millard of Stillwater appointed as a committee on new members, Dr. Pratt of Stillwater, Dr. Thorn of Hastings, Dr. Craig of Janesville, Dr. Dunsmoor of Minneapolis and Dr. Rosser of Brainerd.

An interesting address was delivered by the president. The report of the committee on medical education, by Dr. C. N. Hewitt, chairman, spoke of the Minnesota medical practice act, which he characterized as giving only the minimum of requirements recognized by the legislature as necessary to the public safety. The first examination by the board will be held at the capitol in S. Paul, Oct. 11, 1883.

Dr. A. J. Stone of St. Paul, introduced for examination a Norwegian leper, whose case presented features of unusual curiosity.

Dr. A. W. Abbott of Minneapolis presented a number of papers upon diptheria and croup by Drs. Flagg, Graves, Dunn and Berry, which he read, and then gave an able paper by himself upon tracheotomy with a minute description of the parts in the immediate vicinity of the operation, which would not be intelligible to laymen. Following the reading of Dr. Abbott's paper a general discussion of the subject of diptheria and croup ensued. Various other reports of an interesting character were presented and discussed.

Dr. Jay Owens submitted his report upon diseases of children.

Dr. W. L. Lincoln, chairman of the committee on obstetrics, read a carefully prepared essay upon that topic, which was listened to with marked attention throughout.

An interesting paper upon nervous diseases was read by Dr. Talbot Jones, of St. Paul, and was followed by a discussion.

Dr. Hunter of Minneapolis presented an interesting case of a compound fracture of the ankle joint, and explained his treatment thereof, which was listened to with great interest.

An interesting essay upon functional diseases was read by Dr. Riggs, of St. Paul. He defined the diseases as peculiar in that the microscope and scalpel afforded the physician no information respecting them. The essayist mentioned in detail the hereditary effects of nervous diseases, and attributed the larger per cent. of the criminal causes to intense civilization, and excessive brain work together with continued physical exertion.

Dr. Hunter of Minneapolis, presented a patient who had suffered a compound fracture of the ankle joint, which had been dressed and treated after the "Lister method," gathering the edges of the wound closely together with silver wires and then cover with a protective of some kind, a spray of carbolic acid being thrown upon the injury during the operation, to prevent bactria.

The Northwestern Lancet was declared the official organ of the society for the ensuing year.

During the sessions of the society the committee reported the following accepted candidates for membership and they were elected:

Drs. John A. Sweat, A. R. Brackett, J. C. Cockburn, J. H. Fairfield, L. C. Mitchell, N. F. Nye, C. H. Hunter, J. H. Stuart, E. E. Barnum, C. L. Flannigan, W. S. Laton, J. R Kinney, F. McKennan, T. G. Rainey, all of Minneapolis; F. R. Burnham, J. F. Fulton, A. B. Ancker, J. W. Thompson, J. W. Chamberlain, Edward Lundgren, J. C. Markoe, J. H. Stewart, jr., William Davis, of St. Paul; Frederick Koyl, Ada; D. P. Biggar, Brainerd; W. T. Adams, Elgin; G. W. Davis, Rice Point; Paul C. Jensen, Albert Lea; W. A. Hunt, Northfield; J. P. Cressy, Granite Falls; Garrett Murphy, Garden City; J. W. B. Welcome, Sleepy Eye; Dr. Merrill, Stillwater; J. E. Cheney, Brainerd; J. R. Johnson, Spring Valley; J. B. Cole, Minneiska.

The following new members were also admitted:

W. C. Eustis, Farmington; Mrs. Belle M. Watruth, St. Paul; G. S. Bingham, St. Cloud; Elijah S. Kelly, Minneapolis; Mrs. A. O Whetstone, Minneapolis; Carl Eutrafs, Shakopee; Henry E. Latz, Minneapolis; O. A. Walter, Stillwater; E. W. Haum, Stillwater; D. Hights, Hastings; W. H. Williams, Minneapolis; J. F. Moon, Minneapolis; C. F. Bean; St. Paul; Ignatius Donnelly, Jr., St. Paul; Dr. Williams, St. Paul; Dr. Allport, Minneapolis; Dr. Stoddard of Redwood Falls; Dr. Dorsey of——; Dr. Boyd of Stillwater. A. Waber, Stillwater; Henry E. Latz, Minneapolis; Carl A. Entrup, Shakopee, and A. S. Whetstone, Minneapolis. The following officers for the ensuing year were elected:

President—W. F. Lincoln Wabasha.

First Vice President—B. I. Davis, Mankato.

Second Vice President—J. Davenport Jr., St. Paul.

Third Vice President—B. L. Moore, St. Paul.

Recording Secretary—C. H. Boardman, St. Paul.

Corresponding Secretary—Clara E. Adams, St. Paul.

Treasurer—S. B. Sheardown, Stockton

Censors, three years—R. S. Mcmurdy, Minneaolis; A. W. Stanchfield, Eyota.

The retiring president, Dr. E. H. Millard of Stillwater, then introduced the president-elect, Dr. W. L. Lincoln, who made a few brief remarks, outlined what he hoped to do, and was greeted with loud applause.

Stillwater was appointed as the place for the next meeting and after adjournment the members took the cars for Hotel Lafayette, Lake Minnetonka, where they had a banquet in the evening.

Grand Grove of Minnesota Druids.

The Grand Lodge of Druids of Minnesota held its sessions in St. Paul on Tuesday and Wednesday. Delegates from all the groves were present and the grand officers. The report of the grand secretary, showed a total membership of the order within the jurisdiction of the grand grove of 934. During the year there were initiated 87; admitted by card 22; reinstated, 12; withdrawn by card, 8; suspended 143; expelled, 2; deceased 10.

The financial statistics were as follows: Revenue of groves, $16,576.44; expenditures, $9,004.64; sick benefits paid $1,301.00; cash on hand, $2,904.82; value of grove property; $20,755 35. The reports from the various groves were of a very encouraging character, showing the order to be in a flourishing condition.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year, and were duly installed by Charles Weber, most noble grand arch of the United States: Grand arch, L. V. Kyte of Waverly; deputy grand arch, H. S. Temple of St. Paul; grand secretary, J. P. Leitner of St. Paul; grand treasurer, J. A. Gilman of Minneapolis; grand marshal, M. D. Manning of Willmar; grand guardian, W. H. Corcoran of Buffalo; grand sentinel, Romaine Shiere of St. Paul, Ed. A. Stevens of Minneapolis was unanimously re-elected representation to the Grand Grove of the United States for the term of four years. It was decided to hold the next annual meeting at Brainerd.

The reports of the relief association showed that there had been but five deaths since organization, and that about $4,000 had been expended in relief. The treasury balance is about $400. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, L. V. Kyte, Waverly; vice-president, H. I. Temple, St. Paul; secretary, J. P. Leitner, St. Paul; treasurer, J. A. Gilman, Minneapolis; medical director, Dr. Charles Griswold, St. Paul.

AT DEVIL'S LAKE.

Upon the arrival of the party at Devil's Lake at 6 p. m. the following day, the party will disembark and take a steamer, which will be in waiting to take them upon a trip around the lake, touching at Fort Tuttle and Grand Harbor. The moon will then be at its full, and the ride on this lake by moonlight will be one of the most delightful incidents of the trip. At Grand Harbor a stop will be had for refreshments. The train will leave Devil's Lake City on the morning of the 20th, and arrive at Winnipeg in the evening. The 21st will be passed at Winnipeg and in excursions in that region. The party will then return direct by the Manitoba railroad to St. Paul. The courtesies of both the Canadian Pacific and the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railways have been tendered to the editorial party, and the necessary sleepers will be provided throughout the whole trip, so that there need be no moving of baggage or going to hotels, except for meals.

Minnesota State Bar Association.

The opening of the June term of the circuit court at St. Paul on Monday brought to St. Paul a large number of members of the bar from all parts of the state. The occasion had been selected as a favorable one for perfecting the organization of the State Bar association, the preliminary steps toward which were taken upon the first day of the April term of the supreme court. The members of the bar in attendance were then invited to subscribe to the roll, and the invitation was very generally accepted, forty signatures being obtained. The conditions upon which they are to hold membership being the payment of $3 down and $2 annually. Mr. Gordon E. Cole of Faribault was elected president of the association for the term ending in April, 1884. A committee to nominate the balance of the officers was then appointed. The New Ulm Review gives an airing to the refined æsthetic taste to its county officials in the following incisive paragraph: "The court house square is beautifully bordered with a patch of potatoes. It is possible that our county has become so poor that it cannot pay its officials and support its poor without renting out the court house square for a vegetable garden."

Ignatius Donnelly will deliver the Fourth of July oration at Fergus Falls.

The postoffice at Brainerd has been placed at the head of second class offices in Minnesota.

Fifteen Minneapolis flouring mills are now putting out 12,560 barrels daily.

A man named Edward Turner, a settler, was shot and killed at Vanderbilt, a new settlement 125 miles south of Mandan, Dak. Turner, the murdered man, had a piece of land surveyed and took up a claim upon it. He then went down the river to purchase logs and lumber, with which to build a house, and when he returned he found that another man had jumped his claim. A dispute immediately arose as to the land, during which Turner was shot and killed by the jumper.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Mr. Gierert has gone to St. Paul to purchase the equipment for his new hotel. The material will probably arrive about July first, and the hotel will open for business as early as Mr. Gierert can possibly complete the fitting up.

Buse & Colbentson have had a force at work for some days, repairing their Clearwater dam. They have put in some heavy cribbing which they have filled with rock, and while the work is not yet completed, the effect of raising water in the race is very marked.

George Prenevault, who left here in company with Aime Baril early in spring for the log drive on Rush creek and Clearwater, returned last week, bringing the news of the accidental drowning of young Baril some six weeks ago. It seems they were walking on the river bank when a gust of wind took off Baril's hat. He sprang forward to catch it, and fell into the river, sinking at once and as he was a good swimmer, it is supposed he either struck his head on some hard object or was seized with cramps, as he never came to the surface, and all efforts to find his body have been unavailing. He bore the reputation of beinb a young man of excellent habits and disposition, and the news of his death will be a sad surprise to a large circle of friends.

County Commissioner Nelson took in the improvements in Red Lake Falls last week.

Mr. C. Kretzschmar has contracted with Gerke & Brunner for 100,000 brick for his business block and house. They will be made as soon as the first kiln is completed.

The lower end of F. B. Walker's log drive was at the mouth of Poplar river last Sunday, and tied up there, while the crew went back to bring down the balance. When it is all together they will take a fresh start, and in all probability the main drive will reach Red Lake Falls on or about July 5th.

A grand Fourth of July celebration will be held in Fertile, Garfield Township, Minn., when the following program will be carried out:

THE EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Prepration for the Annual Meeting and Excursion—A Banquet in St. Paul And a Trip to Devil's Lake and Winnipeg Arranged For

The programme for the annual meeting and excursion of the Editorial Association of Minnesota, which is to be held in St. Paul on July 18th, is given below. The meeting will open at 1 p. m. The proceedings of the afternon will include reception exercises, the annual address of the President, an address to the editors of Minnesota and the reading of ten-minute papers upon the following topics:

First. The Editorial; second. The Local; third, The Personal; fourth. The Patent Medicine and Foreign Advertising; fifth, The Circulation, how best obtained and maintained; six. The Local Correspondence from Neighborhood and Villages; seventh, Ready Print, Its Economy, Its Use and Abuse; eighth, The use of Stereotype Plates and Apparatus in Country Offices.

A recess will be taken from 5 to 6 p. m., and at six a banquet will be served. At 8:40 the members will embark upon an excursion to the north.

Upon the arrival of the party at Devil's Lake at 6 p. m. the following day, the party will disembark and take a steamer, which will be in waiting to take them upon a trip around the Lake, touching at Fort Totten and Grand Harbor. The moon will then be at its full, and the ride on this Lake by moonlight will be one of the most delighful incidents of the trip. At Grand Harbor a stop will be had for refreshments. The train will leave Devil's Lake City on the morning of the 20th, and arrive at Winnipeg in the evening. The 21st will be passed at Winnipeg and in excursions in that region. The party will then return direct by the Manitoba railroad to St. Paul. The courtesies of both the Canadian Pacific and the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railways have been tendered to the editorial party, and the necessary sleepers will be provided throughout the whole trip, so that there need be no moving of baggage or going to hotels, except for meals.

The time has been so planned that no editor of a weekly paper, at least, need fail to avail himself of the opportunity for the trip or deprive his wife of the pleasant and instructive journey for lack of time or means. The meeting and excursion therefore should be the largest ever known in the Northwest.

It is proposed to hold the meeting at the St Paul market house, or the State capitol, as can hereafter be most conveniently arranged, announcement of which will be made in due time. The editors and wives can repair at once to the place of meeting upon arriving in the city, where convenience will be provided for entertainment until time for taking the train.

A Grand Record.

The American Sunday School Union has just closed the 59th year of its labor for the children. The aim of this undenominational Society is to unite all the people in the study and teaching of the Bible and especially to reach the communities where the children are not otherwise cared for.

From March 1st, 1882 to March 1st, 1883 it established 2,252 new Sunday Schools, and brought 10,876 teachers and 82747 scholars into them. It aided for the first time 2,089 other schools, having 15,607 teachers and 143,103 scholars. Of schools previously aided and reported, there were in addition to the above 2.834, with 15.379 teachers and 143.095 scholars. It held 9,918 meetings, distributed 5.940 Bibles and 13,080 Testaments and visited 35,808 families. $11,069 worth religious papers was given to needy schools. Thus in a single year this grand old society planted Bible Schools in 2,252 settlements where there were no schools in operation, and aided schools in 5,021 other communities in which there are 41,361 teachers and 374,607 scholars. To accomplish this mighty work it expended $99,049.51.

Among the immediate results of this work for the children the annual report shows 3,110 conversions and the developing of 184 churches of different names.

If the desire is to evangelize this land it seems hardly possible to find a cheaper or more practical agency than this to do it. Less than one dollar for each child gathered into Sunday School, is certainly as economical as any could desire. With such men as Hon. Wm. Strong of the Supreme Court, Pres. J. M. Crowell D. D. of Philadelphia, Sec'y. Samuel Merrill of DesMoines Ia., John Deere of Moline, D. R. Noyes of St. Paul, John S. McDonald of Wisconsin, Levi J. Leiter, Hon. Mark Skinner, Norman Williams, S. M. Moore B. F. Norris, Mark Ayres, E. G. Keith, Marvin Hughitt, C. B. Nelson, R. E. Jenkins, of Chicago, L. L. Day of Peoria, Henry Phelps of Lewistown, Prof. Geo. Churchill, O. F. Johnson of Galesburg, John P. Manny of Rockford, Timothy Hudson of Kalamazoo, Thos Officer, N. P. Dodge of Council Bluffs, D. C. Bell of Minneapolis, vice Pres. and F. G. Ensign Sup't Chicago Ill. to direct its work in the North-west contributers may be sure their money will be well used; of this the Report speaks for itself.

A number of the business men in the West are each sustaining a missionary of this Society at an expense of $800, per year. Thus, while they cannot go themselves, they can gather from 25 to 30 schools a year, and bring in from 700 to 1000 children for Bible study, where they will have every week a good book of wholesome teaching put into their hands to read. He who can thus give, help and health, and gladness to a thousand young hearts a year by his gifts, enjoys a rare privilege and does a grand service for his country. Many will rise up and call him blessed by and by. Any amount given will help forward the work.

LOCAL NEWS.

Lovely wheat weather but a little rain would be a good thing.

Harry Ives, of St. Hilaire, was in the city on Monday to see how St. John's Day boomed.

Geo. H. Reynolds, of Alexandria has been in the city for a few days seeing how it is himself.

Mr. O. A. Ullen, of St. Hilaire dropped in to see us on Monday. He says they are going to have the boss time up there on the 4th.

Frank Roderigue had a severe sun stroke on Monday last while driving with his wife. It was said to be a serious case.

The Crookston band gave an open air concert on Saturday evening. They will continue their pleasant musical entertainments.

A. Allen opened a kiln of brick on Saturday a sample of which was showed us. It is as solid as stone and has the ring of the true metal.

Wm. Wylie was in from Black River with his wife on Monday, fixing up those postmaster bonds for the new post-office at Wylie on the Black.

Geo. Warninger has taken possession of his new residence, corner of Main and Fifth street. It was built by Jos Netzer and is a model of taste and comfort.

Gene Sitlwell, representing Russe Averill & Carpenter of St. Paul, was in the city over Sabbath. Gene says Crookston is the boss town of the Northwest.

The Double Uncle Tom's Cabin which is to appear in Ericsson's hall to-night is very highly spoken of by the press of the country. Don't fail to hear this rendition of the old drama.

Court adjourned on Saturday afternoon for a recess until Monday aftrer moon. Judge Stearns left for a visit to An Arbor Mich., and Judge Collins, of St, Clodd supplies his place during his absence.

The JOURNAL out-fit were surprised on Friday at receipt of a keg of Crookston beer, sent in by the proprietors of the brewery. This company have added to their facilities of brewing until they can and do make as good an article as can be found any where. They are over-run with orders constantly.

Bro. Hoge, of the East Grand Forks Courier brought the biggest part of the town over to attend the Colby trial on Tuesday. By the way Hoge has bought Vale's interest in the Courier and will hereafter go it alone. He is a capable newspaper man, a ready writer and will make a success of the Courier if any one can.

W. H. Graver, of Euclid, reports grain looking well but needing rain somewhat. His neighborhood is runing a New Era Grader and ditcher and building good roads. Mr. G., is one of the progressive farmers who do not pin their faith wholly to wheat and he he has several fine colts to show this summer. He will try stock-raising and if satisfied will engage extensively in it.

Messrs. O. A. Johnson and G. H. Palmer, of St. Hilaire, were in the city on Monday. They report business in real estate waking up since the road was compleated to St. Hilaire. They are now prepared with a large and fine list of real estate to attend to the call of all who desire to purchase. If you go up that way to invest dont fail to hunt them up and look at what they have to offer.

A large mass meeting was held on Saturday night to consider ways and means for the erection of a large saw-mill in Crookston. Rattling speeches were made by Judge Reynolds, Ansel Bates, J. R. Clements, Hon. H. Steenerson, M. R. Brown and many others favoring a big effort to secure the location of a sawmill in Crookston. A committie was appointed for active and immediate work and there will be something done if it comes within the range of human possibilities.

The Glorious Fourth!

A grand picnic and church fair, under the auspices of the Scandinavian Lutheran Society will be held on their church grounds on the 4th. Hon. H. Steenerson, of Crookston, and Rev. P. O. Stromme, of Ada, will deliver the orations. Refreshments served.

W. E. McKenzie, of the St. Hilaire Spectator was looking over the city court week.

St. John's Day was duly observed in our city. A big celebration was held in Dobson's grove where everybody and his wife or his best girl appeared and seemed to have a splendid time.

W. G. Mitchell, ye St. Vincent Herald man, piloted R. R. Heidenberg and A. Brin into our camp on Friday for a chat. These gentlemen were in our city for business and recreation and were pleased to see our great, big, new roller mill nearly completed and the other one fast nearing completion. Come again, gents!

To appear in our city to night A Double Uncle Tom's Cabin. The Double Mammoth Uncle Tom's Cabin Company is the largest company traveling, and will be remembered is the company that made the big hit in St. Paul last week. This same company played in all the leading cities in U. S; Chicago two weeks. Haverly's Philadelphia Theatre commencing May 1st, two weeks to packed houses. Haverly's Nibols theatre. New York, three weekf to an enormous business, and the only Uncle Tom's Cabin allowed in the great Boston theatre since the war. The double part of this show means the introduction of two funny Topsies, two Marks, the lawyers, 2 trick donkeys, and 6 mammoth blood hounds. Crookston may be assured of a big show, as the press everywhere speaks loud in pralise of this mammoth company Reserves seats 75 cts. Now on sale at Tom Morris jewelry store.

Caucus Meetings Saturday Evening.

At the caucus in the First Ward H. E. Cooke was elected chairman, W. H. Jennings secretary. Delegate chosen to the County conventon on Monday, H. E. Cooke. The following ward committee was appointed viz,: I. U. Jennings, chairman, H. E. Cooke and W. H. Jennings. In the Second ward Wm. Ross, was elected delegate, in the Third W. H. Topping and in the Fourth, John McLean.

Berkshires.

I have a few Berkshire pigs now ready for delivery. Parties who have spoken for them should call for them before the middle of next week as I shall send them out to the farm the latter part of next week. They are a choice lot and I have but few to sell. AARON COOKE.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELla Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagamie, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagees, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 26th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 428 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100,) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due, as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-five dollars, ($555,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 20th day of July A. D. 1883, at two o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated June 1st, A. D. 1883.

VOL. VII. CROOKSTON, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA, THURSDAY, JULY 5, 1883. NO. 10

CROOKSTON, Minn., May 16th 1883

Hon. KNUTE NELSON, Alexandria Minn.

SIR:—I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of four pre-emption filings, No. 626 Andrew O. Paulson, No. 528, Lars B. Larson, No. 532, Albert O. Lorum, and No. 537, Jacob Hasbey made in this office on the 2d of August 1872, which filings were canceled by Commissioner's letter "F" dated April 7th, 1873 for the reason that the lands were within the "forty mile limit" of the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant, (so far as relats to the odd numbered sections.) These cancellations were based upon a decision by the Interior Department, that the company's right to the grant took effect from the date of the acceptance of the map of general route by the Department (August 13th, 1870.) Under the Departmental decision dated May 13th, 1873 awarding the lands in the overlapping limits (within which the tracts now in question lie) to the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad, St. Vincent Extension, the right of the latter attached in the odd sections, Sept. 1st, 1871. In commissioners letter "F" dated Nov. 24th 1880, it is held that the right of the St. P. & P. R. R., does not attach to their land grant before the 4th day of September 1872. In Commissioner's letter "F" dated July 8th, 1873, it is held that the right of the N. P. R. R., to its grant did not attach until the date of the actual definite location of the road and filing of the map in the General Land Office, November 21st, 1871.

I also invite your attention to a decision of the present Honorable Secretary of the Interior in the case of Graham vs Hastings & Dakota R. R. Co., reported in Copps, Land Owner for March 1883 page 256, and the present Hon. Commissioner's decision in the case of Johnson vs. St. Paul & Sioux City R. R. Co., Copps' Land Owner April 1883, page 20.

Your attention is also respectfully invited to the act of Congress approved April 21st, 1876, to comfirm pre-emption and homestead entries within limits of railroad grants in a certain class of cases, U. S. Statutes at large Vol. 19, page 35.

The final proofs of the parties whose declaratory statements are herewith enclosed, were, after due publication of their intention to do so, offered at this office and rejected for conflict with the claims of the railaoad companies, and forwarded to the General Land Office, May 19th and 20th, 1882.

In addition to the foregoing I enclose three pre-emption filings, Nos. 1206, 1216 and 1217, filed Oct. 8th and 20th 1874, in this office, which filings were allowed under the act of June 22d. 1874, U. S. Statutes at large Vol 18, part 3, page 203, and Commissirner's letter "F" dated September 12th (two) and 23d 1874.

The rejected final proofs of Hans H. Bangen (D. S. No. 1216) and Peter Thompson (D. S. No. 1217) were forwarded to the General Land Office March 28th, 1882, and Thom Anderson's final proof (D. S. No. 1208) was rejected and forwarded May 18th, 1882. These proofs were rejected for conflict with the claims of the St. P. & P, R. R. Co.

In the matter of these cases, I invite your attention to the decision of the Hon. Commissioner of the General Land Office, in letter "F" dated March 25th, 1875, where he ordered the patenting of Robert Houston's land, and the decision of the Hon. Secretary of the Interior, dated August 14th 1870, ordering patent to issue in the case of Nels R. Hage both under the act of June 22d 1874.

It is within my personal knowledge that all the aforenamed settlers have been constantly living on their respective lands since their first settlement thereon as shown by their declaratory statements, and that they have made valuable improvements on the same; therefore a final decision which shall deprive them of their homes upon these lands will work great loss and hardships for these men who have worked so long and so hard in good faith to secure the end which is supposed to be the primary object of our liberal land laws.

Understanding that you will soon be in Washington, these cases are forwarded to you in the confident hope that you will give them your attention and your powerful and effective influence will aid in securing the just rights of these settlers. Respectfully

P. C. SLETTEN.

The following shows that the above article is beginning to bear fruit and that something will now be done for the benefit of the settler.

Hon. K. Nelson, Alexandria, Minn.

SIR:—I have this day directed the Register and Receiver at Crookston, Minn. to allow Hans H. Bangen to make a pre-emption entry under the 3d section of the act of Aprill 21st, 1876, of the South ½ South West¼ and South ½ South East ¼ of Sec 11 148 49, subject to appeal by the St. Paul Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway Company.

Very respectfully,

N. C. McFarland.

Commissioner.

Since the above letter was received at the U. S. Land office in Crookston have received instructions to allow final proof upon all of the claims in Norman County, mentioned in Mr. Sletten's letter and there is now no question but that all cases similiar to those will be allowed as fast as they can be reached.

AN AMAZING EVOLUTION.

W. W. Cole as an Amusement Monopolist —His Great Scheme—Foreign—Productions, Etc.

(From the St. Louis Republican)

Already the carefully guarded intentions of W. W. Cole, the great circus manager, have created no little commotion in the amusement world, and the reckless, yet deliberate, manner in which he has entered upon a most extravagant project for the coming season has, for the moment, stupefied his opponents. With a Western headquarters in St. Louis, Mr. Cole (with his agents located in New York, London and Paris) has brought to bear upon his colossal entertainment all the elements that might further his interest. The most lavish outlays have been made. Among other foreign attractions, a troupe of real Bedouin Arabs has been secured, and will soon arrive in our city. These desert-born performers are quite the reverse of anything ever seen on this continent, and will appear in a series of the most remarkable acrobatic evolutions ever witnessed. They will form lofty pyramids, leap over lines of fixed bayonets, somersault over high objects, and perform various athletic feats while holding swords, cutlasses and daggers in their hands. The troupe includes male and female performers and they will also be seen in situations characteristic of the harems and desert life. In the great street pageants they will ride genuine Kalmuck camels and, thoroughbred Arabic horses. In the circus proper, three rings—side by side—and an enormous elevated theatre stage will be required to produce the multiplicity of novelties which have, recently been added. A system has been adopted whereby simultaneous acts will not conflict or detract one from the other. Russian roller skates bicycle experts, gladiatorial games and pastimes will take place on the elevated stage. A number of English and French equestrians have been engaged, and all riders will appear on bareback horses. A large number of Oriental and foreign features, the nature of which it is not policy to now make public, will be presented. Samson the gigantic elephant, whose ponderous proportions have placed him among the mastodons of earth, will constitute one of the leading menagerie features. A general outline of this great enterprise will be given in these columns at some future time.

A tour of the country has already been mapped out, and this colossal exhibition will appear in this city on Saturday July 21st.

The Northern Tier says that the Allen Spectacular company paid no bills in this city. The Tier knows better than that because its own bill was paid with the rest, at a discount. Give the devil his due, Jack.

The State of Minnesota, to all persons, companies or corporations, who have or claim any estate, right, title or interest in, claim to, or lien upon, any of the several pieces or parcels of land in the list hereto attached described:

The list of taxes and penalties on real estate for the county of Polk remaining delinquent on the first day of June, 1883, has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the District Court of the County of Polk of which that hereto attached is a copy. Therefore you, and each of you are hereby required to file in the office of said Clerk within twenty days after the last publication of this notice, your answers in writing, setting forth any objection or defense you may have to the taxes and penalties, or any part thereof, upon any piece or parcel of land described in said list, in, to, or on which you have or claim any estate, right, title, interest, claim or lien.

And in default thereof judgment will be entered against such piece or parcel of land for the taxes on said list appearing against it, and for all penalties, interest and cost.

THOS. C. SHAPLEIGH.
[SEAL] Clerk of the District Court, in and for the County of Polk, Minn.

STEAMSHIP ALASKA, At Sea, Special Correspondence, May 23.—Here I am, on the swiftest ocean steamer, a few leagues from the coast of much-troubled Ireland, which lies far off in the sun, like a piece of blue flannel in a particularly large and serene tub. What to write about now is the question. We have had a rather rough passage for this season—head winds and a choppy sea all the way—but you don't care much about that. To say that one of the Wiggins storms prevails—that is, the ocean is like a mirror, shimmering with ripples of light—but you don't care a red cent about that. The last passenger with a greasy stomach has crept on deck and is now reclining and sunning himself on one of those wooden grasshoppers called a "steamer-chair"—result of the careful interbreeding of a rocking-chair and saw-horse. I am writing, in the great dining-room, on one of the five seventy-five feet long tables, on a bright red spread that dazzles my eyes. And every few minutes, all day, a steward comes along and says to the writers that he really must have the tables now, to set them for coffee, or breakfast, or lunch, or dinner, or supper, or some of the other specimens in the everlasting monotony of feeding. [Only three things are ever done on a steamer—eating, uneating, and betting. So we are remorselessly swept away, to collect our shattered ambitions again after awhile. A vessel like this ought to have a room where quiet people can write letters and read undisturbed. And the state-rooms ought to be larger; they are fearfully cramped and uncomfortable. But then, one can't expect everything. We have seen four other steamers going the same way, that left three days before we did, and have passed them all as if they were tied to posts; and for this blessing I suppose we ought to be willing to write in an anarchy of bread and butter, and sleep in coffins on the hot side of stuffy vaults. The Alaska is a great steamer, and as she has tremendous engines whose fires are fanned by a head wind, and as from her build she is capable of enormous displacement of water, she goes like a deer; but when I build my steamer it will be an improvement on the Guion racers to some extent. Now I have told you positively all there is to tell about the passage; let us see about the passengers:

MR. ABBEY'S PLANS.

Among the passengers is Henry E. Abbey, the impressario, Langtry's sponsor, Col. Mapleson's vis-a-vis, and heir apparent to the big new Opera house in New York. He moves about amid the sympathy of all, as you may guess, for he came from the funeral of his wife direct to the ship the day we sailed. He is not more than five feet nine, but he is what the discriminating Mrs. Ponsonby would call "a fine figger of a man," and he must be firmly and stoutly knit, for he has not had an overcoat on him since we started, and he is the only passenger who has no deck-chair and no rug or other wrap. In an olive cutaway suit, close-fitting, he walks vigorously up and down the long hurricane deck, never sitting for a moment, talking only with those who will walk with him. He tells me there is nothing new about his plans for next winter, but that he can probably give me something new next week. He will return in September, bringing Nilsson, Lembricht, and various other eminent prime donne, contraltos, tenors, etc., with him, and will be followed in October by Irving, Miss Terry and their select company of fifty. I shall meet Mr. Irving next week, and will get his pre-impressions of America, which like Bolger's pocket-knife, will be "not valuable but curus." Mr. Abbey thinks the new Opera house, which the Vanderbilts, D. O. Mills and other millionaires of New York are building for him, and will finish by September, will lay over anything else in America by a great ways. He insists that the brick facade on Broadway is going to be a beautiful and impressive bit of architecture, but I don't see how it ever can be. The stage will be the largest in America—100 feet square! It will have nearly 100 feet of practicable depth, and the drops, Mr. Abbey says, will have a fall of forty-five feet, and a width of seventy-one feet. He doesn't know what the drop-curtain is going to be—that is left to the taste of the owners—but Mr. Abbey will furnish all the scenery.

The new Opera house will seat 3,200 people, and will have three tiers of all-around boxes, 125 in number, and every box will have a salon or private vestibule of its own. The house will be lighted by Edison, and will be equipped, furnished and finished in the most modern style. The auditorium will be mainly lighted by a crown of electric bulbs over the center, but gas will probably be retained for the present in the dressing rooms, ante-rooms, etc. Within, I have no doubt, this house will be very magnificient, quite overtopping the old Academy on Irving place.

AMERICANS AND HIGH ART.

There is on board a noted connoisseur of the fine arts from Hartford, Mr. A. D. Vorce, whom I knew in the treasury department at Washington twenty odd years ago, a gentleman of culture, but not of leisure, for he could never be still ten minutes at a time if he were worth a million dollars. He comes to Europe with a view to seeing the best purchasable pictures and buying here and there. Of course this is the very time to come to see everything there is. In [illegible] the exhibition of the Royal Academy is now open during these seven weeks, and there are five shows at the water-color galleries, to say nothing of the galleries of sale and exhibition at Wallace & Sais', Arthur Tooth's, Colnaghi's, etc., and the visitor to Paris finds the Salon presenting to the lover of art a view of its treasures from May 1 to June 20.

There are, as is well known, two distinctive schools of painting—the school of the close filling in of details, of which B. C. Koekkoek in Germany is an eminent master, and the broad, suggestive school of Diaz, Rousseau and Corot, which has had a striking modern development, and is a sort of remonstrance against the Dutch masters of minutiæ. Both of these have their devotees in America, but there is, especially in our country, a growing taste for the moderate middle school. As to English painting, it is scarcely represented at all among us, probably because our people prefer French and German art, which harmonizes more with our spirit and tendencies, and partly because the best English paintings are held very high. Mr. Norce says:

"There are not more than three first-class English paintings sold to America in a year. Sir Frederick Leighton's price for a portrait is $15,000—that is what Disraeli and Gladstone paid him—but if I were a New York or Chicago millionaire I would have one of Sir Frederick Leighton's great mythological paintings. I have seen some of them in the Royal Academy that would make you hold your breath. Like all English art they are somewhat painty and heavy, but they are real creations."

A PAINTER'S PROMISE.

"Do you know the history of that superb picture—Napoleon's Review—by Meissonier, in Mrs. A. T. Stewart's gallery?"

I answered in the negative, and he went on:

"French and German artists have, as a rule, no consciences—no financial moral sense of any sort. They do not scruple to break their engagements, if they can get more money by doing so. That painting of Napoleon's Review was begun a good many years ago for Mr. Probasco, of Cincinnati, and was ordered through Mr. Knoedler of New York. Probasco said to Knoedler "I want something good of Meissonier's. He is a rising man and is going to be a great painter. I want nothing small or commonplace; I want a large historic picture, on an important theme, rich in detail, and I am willing to pay well for it. Knoedler went to Meissonier, who was not then very widely known, to order the picture. They agreed on $10,000 as the price of it, and the grand review of the first Napoleon as the subject. They also fixed the size three feet by four, or whatever it is. It was to be done the next spring. Well, the next spring Mr. Knoedler went over to England to see about it. Not done. Not begun. Busy. Hadn't been able to to think about it. And had concluded not to think about it for less than $20,000.' 'But we agreed on $10,000.' 'Yes, I know, but it is worth more: $20,000 or no picture.' K. telegraphed to Probasco. 'Yes, yes; pay it and get the picture.' So $20,000 was agreed on as the price; the next spring as the time. The next May Knoedler went across the ocean. Meissonier had not touched it. Hadn't had time. Hadn't felt like it. Couldn't feel like it for less than $25,000. 'O, you know yourself I couldn't paint such a picture for $20,000. Do you say $25,000?'

"'Really, Mr. Meissonier, you are trifling with my principal. He may think I am trifling with him. You do not keep your promises.'

But there was more telegraphing to America, more remonstrances, and the concession of the extra $5,000. The picture was to be ready the next spring to go to Cincinnati. The next spring Knoedler went to Paris. Again Meissonier engaged by telegraph to meet him, and failed to do so. Was busy. K. called at his studio. Not there. Finally, failing to secure audience, called at his home and cornered him. Same old story. Not done. But well begun. Hard art. Would make a splendid picture—figures—composition—spirit—oh, grand, grand! But he must have $30,000 for it!

"The same now monotonous negotiations with Cincinnati were gone through with, and the final result was a promise by the patient and long suffering Probasco to pay the $30,000.

"The next spring—let me shorten this—the cheeky Meissonier, who had now received special honors in the salon, demanded $40,000! Probasco got mad. He told Meissonier to go to the artistic heaven of liars and swindlers, to get out, that he wouldn't have one of his pictures at any price.

"So the bargain with Cincinnati was off. Meissonier finished his picture and sold it for $35,000, and it cost Mrs. Stuart $78,000 in America. That's the way with a good many continental artists. I hear that she had a standing offer of $135,000 for it."

Here we are, thumping against the bar in the Mersey, and trying to make head for Liverpool.

W. A. CROFFUT.

THE GAMBLING MANIA.

LONDON, Special Correspondence, June 2.—It is a week since the Alaska touched land and I sent off my first letter. Just before finishing that letter in the dining room, I went on deck and found that the betting mania, which had manifested itself for three days rather strongly, had grown into a frenzy. Some thirty of the passengers, who had now become pretty well acquainted, were seated in a circle on deck hotly discussing the contingencies of landing. In the smoking-room below deck were other groups gathered around tables in a cloud of smoke, watching an overgrowing pile of gold and silver in the center of each table, uttering strange, mystic cries, solemnly dealing more cards, and occasionally raking in the little piles of specie thus exposed. Their faces were white and unsullied by the sun. But the group on deck wore upon their noses the hectic flush of solar blandishment, and each one was shedding skin enough to make a pocketbook. When the steamer lands, the visitor can easily distinguish the poker players from the rest, because each ardent poker player bears aloft a blanched and undecorated prow. But there are are other ways of gambling beside poker playing. Here sit the ruby revelers on deck—staid people from New York, Boston, Vicksburg and Oshkosh—railroad men, merchants, ministers, drummers, professors—fighting time with a new diversion. They all talk English money, now, for they have it in their pockets.

"I'll bet a guinea," says the stout doctor from Chicago, "that the number of the pilot's boat at Queenstown (pronounced Queens't'n) is even."

Taken by a little man in spectacles, walking up and down the deck, and they exchange cards. And the little man adds, "A pound to a shilling that the pilot doesn't wear a silk hat." This is discussed by nearly all the group, and, finally, it being thought that the odds are not great enough, the bet is made two pounds to a shilling. "What'll you bet he doesn't wear a swallow-tail coat and white neck-tie?" put in a man in a red fez. But this is thought too preposperous and is not insisted on. Bets are now made in rapid succession, of a shilling to a pound, that the pilot is married; that he will have his pantaloons tucked into the top of his boots; that he will have red hair: that he will be clean-shaven; that he will have five children (at the time of meeting the vessel, of course); that he will carry an umbrella; that he will step on the ladder with his left foot first.

"I'll bet $2 even," says a theatrical manager, who has been ill most of the way, and has not yet learned the new language, "that the pilot don't wear any socks or undershirt." Even this queer bet finds a taker.

"Let's bet on the number of his boots," says Henry E. Abbey, languidly. "I'll bet a guinea he has twos," says Moore, president of the Mutual Union.

"I'll bet," exclaims Sansome, "that you'll find out the size and weight of his boots when you try to verify some of your other bets!" [Laughter.]

"Let's bet on his name," suggests a reckless young fellow with a nose like a full blown rose.

"I'll bet," said a lady in a yellow rug, turning softly in her steamer chair and lifting her head from her pillow, "that this pilot's name is Pontius."

And so they went on by the hour, while the lilac band in the distance broadened and deepened in contour and color, and the sailing vessels we had passed faded away to the west, and the big gulls, harbingers of land, came out and greeted the great ship, flitting before it like heralds and dashing joyfully after it along its silver train.

LIVERPOOL.

A glance at Liverpool. I stayed there two days and was not very deeply impressed. The public buildings are adequate, and some of them even stately; the streets are irregular enough to be picturesque; the two parks—Princes and Sefton—are sizable and well kept, and the Liverpoolians are fond of exclaiming that the latter-named is "the finest city park in England." The choicest inner portion of these parks is locked out from the public and reserved for the exclusive use of the gentlemen whose mansions encompass it, in the midst of beautiful and fragrant gardens. I called at several of these which were to let, and found that they could be had for $300 to $1,000 a year. Imagine an imposing stone mansion, in the midst of lovely gardens and lawns, and opening down through a grove to one of the most charming parks in the world—a mansion large enough for a family of a dozen— to be had for a rental of $75 a month. But this very fact, attractive as it seems at first sight, is an infallible sign of bad times in England. Her day of prosperity is past. It is hard work to make a living in "the fast-anchored isle." High rents are a sign of thrift. The streets of Liverpool, "the chief commercial city of Great Britain," are very still, and to a New Yorker every day seems like Sunday. The first question an American asks is, Where are all the drays? Where are the carriages? Is this a holiday? We drove for hours in the afternoon through the fashionable streets and up and down the famous park roads, and did not meet more carriages than we could count on the fingers; in New York or Chicago, St. Paul, Detroit, or St. Louis, they would have been ten times as numerous. The great Percheron-Norman draught horse, with one of his shaggy feet as big as a half-bushel, still moves slowly through the town—a huge, hairy reminiscence of the times before decay set in—what Mr. Huxley would call "an obvious survival." Of course we visited the tremendous granite docks that loom along the Mersey like a fortification, impregnable and imperishable. The docks are not exactly a part of Liverpool; they are Liverpool; without them Liverpool would not exist. They are the source of her pride, and of whatever prosperity she has left. They bring to the subscribers an income of $5,000,000 a year. But this, I find by inquiring, is not three per cent on the investment; and as for the ships which find shelter here, they do not return two per cent to their owners. The fact is that Liverpool is in the position which Venice occupied in the sixteenth century—her power is departing. She is the complacent mart of a bankrupt nation. England to-day is levying, not on her earnings, but on her savings. She grows poorer year by year. It will be several generations before Macaulay's New Zealander will squat triumphantly on London bridge and view the ruins of St. Paul's, but he is not nearly so preposterous a figure as he was.

IN PARLIAMENT.

I delayed availing myself of Minister Lowell's offer of an "order" to visit the houses of parliament, and last evening the notion siezed me to go, notwithstanding, and take my chance to get in. A friend was in similar mood, and we started of. My "guide" says, "Nobody can be present at a debate in the commons without an order from a member of parliament." I had met two of the members in New York, my friend knew another, and had a letter to still another; but, on sending our cards in from the lobby, we discovered that none of them were present.

My friend said to the doorkeeper, in his sweetest voice, laying his hand on my shoulder:

"This is a distinguished stranger from America. He is one of our most celebrated redacteurs."

I straightened up and looked modestly away.

"Hime truly sorry I cahn't let ye hup, gentlemen. Hime very frenly to 'Mericans. But it wud be much ez my head wuz wuth to let ye hup without a order."

"I can't get used to your blamed money," said my friend, taking out a two shilling piece; "now just tell me how much that is in American money."

"That," said the doorkeeper, slyly taking the coin and biting it; "his about ekle to your arf a dollar."

"Now you give me a couple of orders," said my friend, "for us two distinguished Americans, and we will go in and sit with Mr. Gladstone while you figure on this. I'll leave the coin with you till I come out."

The doorkeeper smiled, calmly lifted up the gold-fringed flap of his side pocket and fished out two printed orders, saying:

Ez luck would 'av it, 'ere's a couple some Honble Member give me to give to some friend of 'is'n wich was a coming in to-night wich 'as n't come.

We took the orders and passed in. Among the vices we are compelled to practice in order to get along with any degree of comfort, I let my friend do all of the bribery—not so much on account of moral as financial scruples. It costs something to get through a land which doesn't apparently contain a man with strength of mind enough to refuse a shilling.

Well, here we were, classified as "members' friends," in a gallery at one end of the house of commons—a room seventy-five feet long and forty-five wide. I should think it about one-thirtieth as large as the house of representatives at Washington, though the commons contains one-half more members. Just below us they sit—an hundred or so—mostly with hats on, curled up in grotesque attitudes on uncomfortable benches. At the other end, facing us, sits the speaker in a little sentry box in the middle aisle, with what looks like a bunch of pine shavings on his head. At his right slopes upward the bank of Liberal (government) benches to the wall; and at his left (our right) the corresponding bank of Conservative benches. In the middle of the front bench on the Conservative side sits the Conservative leader—Sir Stafford Northcote—a tall man in Prince Albert coat and gray "trousers," with long, gray beard, and small eyes that are concealed most of the time by the stove-pipe hat pulled forward and resting on his enormous nose, as he sticks out his legs, thrusts his hands deep into his pockets and listens. He listens to Mr. Gladstone, immediately opposite, who stands in front of the lower Liberal bench, and says a few words in favor of the agricultural bill. He speaks in a conversational tone, quietly, with correct rhetoric and small inflection. Presently he sits down. It is noticeable that, all the evening, the premier is about the only man who does not put on his hat, always excepting, of course, the man with the crown of pine shavings who sits in the sentry box. Extending from the sentry box to the center of the hall are the desk of the "clarks" (three clerks, O, American congress!), and tables containing a hundred or so of books; and next to these, in front of the premier, is elevated the great mace of the sergeant-at-arms. It is a gilt club, about the shape of the conventional picture of Cain's, six feet long and a foot through at the butt, and if it is of metal it weighs at least a ton. Mr. Gladstone does not try to swing it around his gray head, but he bows under the shadow of it, and writes in a memorandum book in his lap—probably writing up his diary. To this work he sticks earnestly, while the gabble goes on. He is thin and feeble-looking, but his clearly cut face shines with intelligence, and he glances up every now and then to catch some floating scrap of the debate.

The members of the English parliament are notoriously the worst talkers in the world. Daniel O'Connell must have had a fine background of dullness against which to show off his florid brilliancy. The members all talk in a conversational tone; they hesitate in speech; they hem and haw; they go back to pick up the dropped stitches in their vocal knitting-work; they say "I am—ur—trooly sorry—ur—not to—to be able to agree—ur—with the honorable gentleman—ur—below the gangway—ur"—but let us remember that to "ur" is human.

The house of commons—like the hall of peers at the other end of Westminster palace—is small, cramped, meager; and the commoners, like the lords, talk badly; but, after all, one cannot but have respect for this British parliament. It legislates for the whole of the great realm, and it works cheap. It keeps a firm grip on the empire, but its annual expenses are less those of any American legislature that I happen to be acquainted with. They are not a quarter as great as those of New York. A road can scarcely be laid out without permission of parliament; a new bridge cannot be built without act of parliament; a new dock cannot be erected on the Mersey at Liverpool without act of parliament; and yet all the legislation of last year amounted to only forty-seven pages, while that at Albany made more than 2,200 pages.

BITS OF EXPERIENCES.

I called at Lady Wilde's on Wednesday. She is a stately lady of great force and earnestness, and is a popular entertainer. She bewails the condition of Ireland, and says: "We have not received a single pound from our Irish estates for four years. Our poor tenants cannot pay." Oscar is back from Paris, in quarters on Charles street. His mother tells me that he has cut off his hair. Miss Adelaide Detchon, noted in New York for great beauty and dramatic vivacity, reads at Lady Wilde's reception to-morrow.

This afternoon I have been around to the regular weekly reception given by James Russell Lowell, the American minister, and Mrs. Lowell. It was a characteristically pleasant affair. The residence of our minister is at No. 10 Lowndes square, close by the picturesqueness of Hyde park and the frivolities of Rotton Row, but it is plainly furnished, and the reception was as simple and unceremonious as it could be with any propriety.

Among the Americans whom I have met during the last two days are Theodore Tilton, Mrs. Frank Leslie, Edwin Booth and Miss Agnes B. Huntington, who has been studying music three years in Dresden, and who has just sung there and in Leipsic and Paris. She is said to possess a phenomenal contralto voice, and shortly returns to America.

I have not seen a shawl worn by any woman in England. They are altogether discarded.

AMERICAN PAINTERS' WORK.

The Summer Exhibition at the American Art Gallery in New and Its Advantages—A Fine Display of Notable Though Unambitious Work of American Artists—Some of the Notable Pictures.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, June 13.—The summer exhibition of works by American artists, now open at the American Art gallery in Twenty-third street, fills a want long felt among our painters. The opportunities of exhibiting pictures confessedly for purposes of sale are entirely out of proportion to the large number of works produced every year in the New York studios, and each new exhibition of original work should be regarded as a means of widening the channel of communication between the producing artists and the consuming public or picture buyer. Then, again, at the close of the season, after the winter's work has been sent in to the important spring exhibitions, almost all artists succeed in finishing another picture, less ambitious, probably, than their "Academy" or "American artist" work, before they leave town for the summer sketching trip. It is no small advantage for them to send these demi-saison works to an exhibition where they will be seen, and perhaps sold. Although New York picture buyers are not apt to be in town during the summer, the city is, at this season, full of wealthy Western and Southern visitors, whose interest in art is constantly on the increase; and who, if they buy pictures at all, prefer buying them in New York, rather than in any of the provincial and local exhibitions.

The present collection consists of 150 works, a small proportion of which have been seen before in other recent exhibitions, and a few of them were among those rejected by the jury of the Munich exhibition. Most of the works are small and unambitious, but good. One of the most important pictures is F. A. Bridgman's La Plantation du Colza, exhibited some time ago at the Academy. It shows a French field of colza planted in furrows on a slope of land with figures of peasants and horses. It is in an entirely different vein from that usually worked by this artist whose name is generally identified with Eastern interiors and heads, painted in the manner of Gerome; and to my thinking he is seen to much better advantage in this natural, honest, vigorous representation of proletarian life, than in his over-colored and over-finished harem scenes. The tone and effects of light in the Plantation are particularly good. The figures, both of the peasants and the horses, are firmly drawn, strongly modeled and full of nerve. The work, as a whole, possesses qualities of artistic conscientiousness and truthfulness which give it more than ordinary value.

OTHER NOTABLE WORKS.

Another excellent work, which might serve as a companion picture to The Plantation, is called The New Year, by H. R. Poor. It shows a bare New England hillside, so early in the spring that the snow still lies in patches on the sere ground. Two sinewy oxen are in the foreground, attached to a rusty hand plow, directed by a farmer. Another farmer stands at the oxen's heads. This is a remarkably truthful, vigorous and forcible piece of work. The chilly March atmosphere is admirably rendered, the color is excellent, the oxen are finely modeled, and the whole, while highly satisfactory as regards technique, is no less worthy of praise as a purely American subject, treated simply and with singleness of purpose, unmarred by foreign mannerisms or affectations. Bridgman has three Eastern subjects, Young Timbuctoo, a head and shoulders of a black in a rose-colored mantle; a small Turkish Interior, very carefully painted; and a Jewish female head, well-modeled, with careful painting of a veil. Walter Blackman has a good small head of a Munich girl; a decorative panel—a slender female figure in a white robe called Spring; and an ideal head. A small head, well modeled and good in effect of light, is J. Wells Champney's Bertha. R. C. Minor's Souvenir of Italy is a small, mystical landscape, good in color and tone. Another excellent landscape by this artist is called A Quiet Nook. William Hart's Midsummer, a small work, is one of the most satisfactory examples of this artist I have ever seen. It shows a placid stream with tall trees and a few cattle. Mr. Hart repeats himself constantly, and for this reason his larger works are frequently tame and monotonous; but Midsummer is a little gem of landscape art. J. R. Brevoort sends a large landscape—an English heath under a threatening sky, with a thatched cottage in the middle of the canvas and a few figures. George Wright's Smoking-room of a Steamer on a Wet Day at Sea is a good character-study, and presents well-individualized types. S. R. Gifford's Villa Malta is a good study of Italian architecture and atmosphere. S. M. Wiles has a creditable piece of work in an unusual vein, being a view of the Yosemite from Inspiration Point, treated with subtlety and delicacy and good in color. Good flower studies are Daisies, by A. D. Abbott; and Snowballs, by E. M. Scott. An Anxious Mother, by Percival de Luce, is a charming little picture of a ruddy-haired child feeding her doll; good in technique. Upland is a small good landscape by J. Francis Murphy. Moonlight, is a deeptoned bituminous small study by Charles Melville Dewey. William A. Coffin's Close of Day, the large study of the church and churchyard. A Grez, with the figure of an old peasant which was in the Academy, is in this exhibition. It has excellent qualities, but lacks depth of tone and has a certain rawness of color. Another work by this artist, exhibited for the first time, is Waiting—the figure of a girl in black, seen against a stained-glass window.

MORE AMBITIOUS.

William Sartain has an excellent architectural study, good in tone, color and effect—An Arched Street in Algiers. Another strong work by this artist is a landscape, Near the North Shore, Nonquitt, painted in a sober and vigorous manner, full of thought and knowledge. Walter Shulan's Peggy is a sinewy female figure dark in tone. F. D. Millet's Salma is a well painted head of a Roman girl. Constant Mayer's Idyl shows a young girl crowned with ivy, seated on a wall above a stream, with a black dog standing on a stone at her feet. The dog is well given, and there is some good painting in the work. Arthur Quartley sends a marine, A Breezy Day, a space of water swept by the wind, with a rocking fishing boat. Another marine is On the Sands, by Harry Chase, not a favorable example of the artist. A Mother's Cares is an excellent cat picture by J. H. Dolph, which shows a cat and several kittens on a cushion against a pale yellow and green brocaded curtain. W. S. Macy has a winter road scene, hard and wooden in effect. Bruce Crane sends a good landscape—a spring effect, subtle and delicate in treatment. M. F. H. de Haas has a marine—a view on the New England coast. Two small, good works, by Ben Foster, are Nantucket Cliffs, and An October Day. An excellent work in the line of historical genre is Wordsworth Thompson's Noonday in the Olden Time, which shows a roadside tavern, with travelers grouped on the porch, horses drinking at a trough, a boy approaching with a pack of hunting-dogs, and all the accessories of the scene and period excellently rendered, so that the work seems actually alive with historical feeling. Hamilton Hamilton's Peddler's Visit shows a peddler in front of a flower-grown rustic house displaying his wares to a young woman. The color is harsh and raw and the picture lacks tone. Taking Your Picture, by J. H. Witt, shows a pretty little girl with long, fair hair in a red dress drawing on a slate. E. H. Blashfield has a sketch of the Place de la Concorde, in Paris, which is excellent as an impression. The Field is a careful study of a pasture in full sunlight, by C. M. Dewey. Beside the Still Waters is an excellent landscape impression, showing much sentiment, by E. A. Moore. Roses and Peacocks' Feathers, by Mrs. T. W. Dewing, is smudgy and painty. Nasturtiums, by E. M. Scott, is an excellent flower study. Out in the Fields, by Lyell Carr, is a good out of door effect. A child with a blue pinafore is seated on the grass, plucking dandelions. This is an eminently artistic and conscientious piece of work. Mamma's Pets, by C. Adele Fassett, shows a lady and children with birds in a tasteful interior. Grandma's Advice, by T. W. Shields, is not badly painted, but is ridiculously incongruous in the costumes and accessories. John La Farge's large, life-size, full length panels, St. John and St. Mary, which were shown during the winter in the exhibitions of the art club are here. They are treated in a hierarchical manner in imitation of the old masters, are fine in tone and in knowledge of the figure, particularly the St. John. Near Stockbridge, Mass., is a careful, serious study of a quiet landscape by Albert Insley. Noonday on the Marshes, by M. de Forest Bohner, is a work rather monotonous in character and evidently purposely treated in such a way as to intensify the character of monotony. The Young Recruit, by Eastman Johnson, is a nice little genre of a child in uniform, admired by his relations. C. R. Grant has two landscape hits with a single figure in each in the artist's peculiar manner. Waiting, by S. H. St. John, is a life-size study of a red setter. The head is expressive and not ill-painted, but the figure has no firmness and the texture rendering is bad. The artist has evidently aimed at breadth to the exclusion of precision or knowledge. E. Leon Durand's Le Chef-d'œuvre du Grandpere, which was in the academy, is included in this exhibition. D. W. Tryon's South Dartmouth from the Shore, is a good literal reproduction of nature. The Portrait of a Lady by C. Adele Fassett, is not without merit. A. F. Burmer has one of his enamelled silky views of Venetian boats with a Dias sky. Charles Warren Eaton shows several landscapes. J. Carroll Beckwith has a small, well-painted head of a pretty Spanish woman called La Chula. George H. McCord has several landscapes, rather crude in color. Tracy's Fox Terriers are not bad as his dog pictures go. Kruseman Van Elten has a somewhat monotonous landscape, An Afternoon in Connecticut. Charles H. Miller has several landscapes. J. G. Brown has a picture of a child called Give Me a Swing. J. F. Cropsey's View of Lintorn Abbey, England, is rather crude in color, as is also his small autumn landscape. Edward Gay has several lanscapes of average merit. Henry P. Smith has a moonlight marine, rather good in treatment of water and in effect of light and shade. Another good marine is a New Jersey Beach, by F. K. M. Behn. Frank Fowler's View in Venice is better in the distance than in the foreground. Reconnoitering, by Newbold H. Trotter, shows a stag in a landscape. The beast appears to consist only of a head, four legs and the forequarters, so very bad is the foreshortening. Ernest W. Longfellow's Misty Morning, Cambridge, has a Corot-like quality. The Wood Faun, by S. W. Van Schaick, is a quaint decorative work, not without artistic merit. Where Ignorance Is Bliss 'tis Folly to Be Wise, by George H. Story, is a good character study, showing an old man trying to light his pipe with a piece of burning paper. John Lafarge's study of an old tree trunk, though merely blocked in, is an excellent example of truth in values. F. T. Lent's view of the old bridge at Grez, though somewhat mannered in color, composition and treatment, is artistic in effect. Some fair still-life studies are by Marston Ream. Benoni Irwin has a large female head. Bessie is the head of a fair-haired child by C. B. Owen. On the St. Lawrence River, is a good landscape by J. C. Nicolls.

SONNET.

When Philomel her evening psalm hath ceased,
Whilst raptured Echo sinks to sleep again,
And men return to consciousness of pain,
On glow worms doth she solitary feast.
E'en so the poet in his deepest breast
Seeks for that mystic light which, not in vain
Bestowed by him whose wisdom, as his reign,
Is boundless, leads to everlasting rest;
And of this gift celestial weaves such charm
As penetrates the clouds of earthly night,
Stealing the souls of men from vain alarm,
And heav'n discloses to their erring sight—
Song born of light to light is turned at will,
For poetry is silent, music still.

NOTABLES IN NEW ENGLAND

Where Many of the Prominent Authors and Actors Will Pass Their Summer Vacation.

The Homes of a Number of the Leading Writers in Pleasant New England Towns.

BOSTON, Special Correspondence, June 13.—Vacation time is now full upon us, and already the residents of the sultry-aired city are rapidly becoming "birds of passage" and are flocking to the seashore and mountains as fast as social and business engagements permit, to obtain an invigorating breath of cool, fresh air and a sun-browned complexion—Dame Nature's token of health—that even Whittier's "barefoot boy with cheek of tan" would envy. The first to go, usually, are our men and women of note—personages who desire to escape as soon as possible from the constant and tiresome gaze of the ever inquisitive and expectant public, to some spot where the pleasures of private life may be enjoyed and where the tired frame and brain may be rested and strengthened for another season's work. But where are they going and where have they gone? Whittier has left this city, where he passed the winter, and has gone to his old home at Amesbury, Mass., where he will remain until the 1st of July. The poet loves this old-fashioned house in which he has passed so many of his years, and does not leave it until compelled to by the hot weather. The house is an ancient structure, painted white with green blinds, and partly covered in front by creeping vines. There is a small flower garden in front of a few bushes. Whittier spends most of his time in his small closet-like library, which, to a stranger, is quite a curious place. It is furnished with old-fashioned carpets and furniture, dating almost 100 years back. There is a small table, in front of which is a large armchair—the poet's favorite seat. There is a picture of Whittier's mother on the wall, besides a moderate-sized book case, in which are the poet's complete works and a few works of ancient authors badly worn by use. There is but one window, and that looks out upon the side of his neighbor's house—a not very picturesque or romantic view. Whittier invariable spends his vacation somewhere in New Hampshire, either along the shores of Lake Winnipiseogee or up on the sides of the mountains. One of the mountains near Madison has been named in his honor, and he has written many of his charming poems in compliment of the magnificent scenery to be viewed from their summits. Last year he stopped for a few weeks at the Asquam house, Holderness, N. H., and has engaged rooms there again this year.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich, editor of the Atlantic, has already settled down in his picturesque seaside home at Deer Cove, King's Beach, Lynn. In winter the author of From Ponkapog to Pesth, lives on aristocratic Mount Vernon street, at the West end, next door to Charles Francis Adams, Sr., but moves to the beach as soon as hot weather makes its appearance. Until within a few years, Mr. Aldrich has spent his summers at Ponkapog, the place which the author did not think worthy of description in his book. Mr. Aldrich still owns an old house in this rural village, and may later on spend some of his time there. It is quite near Canton, and may be called part of that town, which is some eight or ten miles from Boston. It is two miles distant from the railroad station, and is easiest reached by the tumble-down stage connecting. The house is a quaint, two-story building, built at the beginning of the present century, and is partially screened from the road by cherry trees and by a hedge of arbor vitæ. Back of the house the grounds fall away to a stream and an old mill pond, on which stands a deserted and decaying mill, which was used during the late war for the weaving of soldiers' cardigans. Along the margin of the stream, which, after wandering around the grounds, finds its way out in the great Neponset meadows, and so to the ocean, great quantities of water cresses and curious wild flowers grow, the cowslip and the pitcher plant among them. Mr. Aldrich's nearest neighbor is Henry L. Pierce, the mayor of Boston, who gave his entire official salary to the public library of that city.

SOME FEMALE NOTABLES.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett is one of Mr. Bailey's literary neighbors, occupying Camp Cottage, Ocean street, King's Beach, Lynn. This brilliant authoress leaves her "den" in Washington and goes to the sea shore with her husband and two children, Vivian and Lionel, very shortly. As summer approaches each year, the author of Fair Barbarian and That Lass o' Lowrie's longs to escape from the close quarters of Washington, with its tiresome frivolities, and go to the cottage by the broad Atlantic, where she can breathe the salt and invigorating air and regain her wasted strength. In Washington she lives in a three-story brown front house on I street, between Twelfth and Thirteenth streets. Her cottage at King's Beach is of the ordinary style of summer cottages, prettily painted without and decorated within. It is said that Mrs. Burnett will begin upon a new novel while summering on the seashore.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps has her summer home at Manchester-by-the-Sea. It is a two-story brown cottage, with doors and windows opening upon a piazza facing the sea. The interior decoration exhibits the artistic handiwork of the author. The parlor is a long, narrow room, tinted with a delicate green shade. In other rooms of the house the same taste has directed that one should be rose-pink, another robin's-egg blue, another the delicate shades of buff and brown, while another glories in the native colors of the wood. It is in this house, filled with pictures, bric-a-brac, and love tokens from friends, that the author of Gates Ajar and The Story of Avis lives during the hot weather, breathing the saline breath of the ocean, whose wavelets break calmly on a summer's day upon the charming stretch of beach which greets the peaceful eye.

J. T. Trowbridge lives in a neat, brown house, two and a half stories high, in Arlington, Mass., both summer and winter. Arlington lake, or Spy pond, noted in history, is to be seen from the side and rear windows of the house, affording a charming view. A drawing room furnished with elegance and taste occupies the front half of the house, which is a large dining room. From the east window in the upper hall, Bunker Hill monument and Charleston can be seen, with a good part of the old Hub itself. From the southeast window of the author's study, Mount Auburn, the city of the dead, Cambridge observatory, the hills of Brighton and Brookline form an interesting prospect. It is at this quiet and beautiful place that the author lives contentedly, writing at his leisure, and enjoying life at all times.

Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford and her husband, Mr. R. S. Spofford, have a beautiful summer home on Deer island, in the Merrimac river, just at the edge of Newburyport. They have just returned from a visit to Miss Booth, the editor of Harper's Bazar, in New York, and have settled down for the summer. The house itself is one of those rambling, spacious farmhouses, built to last almost as long as the island itself. In its earlier days it was used as a tavern, and many a tankard of cider has been drank by jovial parties within its walls. It has been remodeled somewhat, and now stands in quiet, half-stately grace. The staircase is broad and quaintly constructed, and above it is open clear through the house, giving grand opportunities for the circulation of the fresh country air. Below, too, it is wide and cool, and offers a delicious retreat in the heat of the day. To the left of the wide hall is the parlor, not particularly attractive in an artistic sense, but cheerful and homelike. This is the most frequented room of the house, and where visitors are entertained.

Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, the novelist, lives the year round in a retired manner in the town of Milton, a few miles from Boston. The estate is about midway between Mill village and the Center, and is most pleasantly situated. The house is large, and cost $275,000 to build throughout, some years ago. It is a brown, double house, with an L and a veranda at the back, while in front is a broad piazza, around the pillows of which twine luxuriantly growing woodbines, and up the side of the house woodbine brought from the Milton woods by her children years ago and planted. Roses and other flowers grow about the place, while gnarled old apple trees and dwarf pears abound at the back. There are also magnificent old elm trees, which shade the house and have given the place the name of Elm Corner. Directly across the road in a curious old house is where "Faith Gartney" used to live.

Mrs. Celia Thaxter is now at her cottage at Appledore island, off Portsmouth, N. H. For years she has spent the summer months upon this picturesque island, that dots the surface of the mighty Atlantic some ten miles from the main shore. The island is much more interesting than the cottage of Mrs. Thaxter. It is a plain, homely, two-storied wooden affair perched on a rock in sharp relief against the sky. There are no bay windows or balconies, no vines or trees, nothing but an ordinary seaside cottage with a small yard filled with flowers. But there is a magnificent view to be obtained of the sea, and during a storm the powerful and savage waves, lashed by a fierce wind, can be seen breaking in sheets of spray and clouds of foam over the rocky shore below. There is nothing to interest one particularly on the island, but a better place in which to live in repose and drink in Neptune's nectar could not be found if search continued for 100 years.

THEATRICAL PEOPLE.

The members of the theatrical profession also have recognized the advantages of the various New England summer resorts at which to rusticate. Edwin Booth will reach the United States from Europe some time this month, and after seeing his daughter bound with matrimonial bonds to Mr. Downing Vaux, will at once go to Newport, where he will occupy his new cottage which has just been built for him there. Kate Claxton and her husband, Mr. Charles Stevenson, have already settled down for the season at Hull, Boston harbor. They own a very pretty cottage at that much frequented resort, but spend much of their time on board their yacht, which is said to be quite fast. "Kate" is quite a sailor and can take her "trick" at the wheel and cock her weather eye at the coming squall with the oldest sea-dog afloat. Next season they will take a theater in New York and produce a new melodrama from the French, as yet unacted on this side of the Atlantic. This and another new piece will be added to their repertoire, and Frou-Frou and The Double Marriage will be dropped. William Warren, Boston's veteran comedian who celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his first appearance on the stage last fall at the Museum, has been invited to visit Joseph Jefferson's new summer house in New Brunswick, but will probably not do so, as he intends to go to Chicago shortly to see his sister, who is the widow of the late J. B. Rice of that city, a well-known theatrical man, who has been mayor and a member of congress. Joe Jefferson, now in this city, will soon go to his island home, some four miles from Canterbury, N. B. He recently purchased an island in an inland lake there, and will spend the summer in pursuit of his favorite sport—angling. A number of New York actors will be his guests during the summer. Sarah Jewett, late of the Union Square company, New York, and her mother have taken possession of their picturesque cottage at Pigeon Cove, Mass. For a number of years past she has spent her vacation months at this well-known seaside resort, occupying an aesthetically decorated cottage. She reads during the heated portion of the day, and in the evening indulges in a game of croquet, a stroll along the beach or a row upon the water. There is nothing that quite comes up to Pigeon Cove in her opinion. A near neighbor is James E. Murdoch, the well-known old-time actor, who owns and occupies a cottage not far away. They are good friends, and visit each other quite often. Pigeon Cove is on Cape Ann, and some ways this side of it is Manchester-by-the-Sea, another popular summering place for actors. J. B. Booth, the older brother of Edwin, and his wife, Mrs. Agnes Booth, of the Madison Square theater, New York, have already settled down in their cottage near the Masconourd house for the season. The veteran John Gilbert, of Wallack's, takes a cottage near them this week sometime. J. C. McCollom and his wife, Mrs. D. P. Bowers, have occupied a cottage there for years, and are now there. Joseph Proctor, "Old Jibbenainosay," is also there, besides a number of lesser stage celebrities. At Cohasset, on the south shore, some twenty miles from Boston, Robson and Crane have already settled themselves for the summer. Stuart Robson owned a small cottage near Charlie Thorn's, but a year or two ago he purchased Charlie's. Crane's habitation is close by, as is also that of Lawrence Barrett. Barrett, however, will not occupy his cottage this season, as he intends to remain in Europe until the theatrical season opens in September. At Ocean Spray, which is a new watering place a few miles from this city, two of the Hanlon brothers—William and Alfred—will pass the summer with a number of other smaller fry. Denman Thompson, Uncle Josh Whitcomb, is "laying off" at Swanzey, N. H., his native village and the place where the character of Uncle Josh was discovered. "Den." has a fine country house, and makes hunting and fishing excursions into the interior. He begins his season Sept. 20, at Indianapolis. John Stetson of the Globe theater, this city, has purchased a handsome cottage at Nantasket for himself and father. John claims to have made $30,000 clear this season at the Globe, besides a sum larger than that in other ventures. He hankered for a trip to Europe, but is a little afraid that his stomach will go back on him as it has on many a better man. Stetson, it is said, will start in heavy next season and will push some of the New York managers pretty hard. It is rather uncertain where Mrs. Annie Louise Cary-Raymond will pass the summer this year. She has a deep affection for her old home in Durham, Me., but may go to the mountains or the beach.

NELSE.

THE PRINCE OF JOURNALISTS.

The Beautiful Home of the Late Emile de Girardin, and the Notables Who Visited It—The Journalist's Wives and Their Receptions—Exploits of Abbe Sicard—A Parisian Managerial Shark.

PARIS, Special Correspondence, May 29.—It was in 1875 that I visited, for the first time, Saint Gratien, the country residence of the late Emile de Girardin, and I again visited it in 1880. On the latter occasion I was invited to do so by a very charming lady, a representative of the photographer Von Bosch, who had to arrange with the master of the house to sit for the picture, which proved the last one that he ever had taken. On that occasion I had a long and pleasant chat with the "king of journalists," as his French confreres used to call him, and it was he himself who showed me over the place. This charming visit was forcibly recalled to my mind the other morning when I read that all the interesting souvenirs of the long and busy life of the celebrated publicist that he himself had shown me at Saint Gratien were about to be sold at auction. There has probably never been a man who had a more passionate admiration for Paris than had M. de Girardin, and he never went further away from it for any extended period than his country villa, where he had for neighbors two ladies, who were the most Parisian of Parisiennes, and his two oldest and warmest friends, Madame Fould and the Princess Mathilde, sister of Prince Jerome Bonaparte, and which, when he was there, became as it were a corner of Paris, for it was a neutral ground where all the various mondes of the capital used to meet. I did not know M. de Girardin at the time when his salon was presided over by his first wife, the celebrated Delphine de Girardin. Later, when literary rivalry led to a separation between M. and Madame de Girardin, and the latter had passed away, a new mistress ruled at Saint Gratien in the person of Mina Tiffenbach, a daughter of the duke de Nassau, who has survived him, and who never caused him any anxiety on the score of his literary laurels. She is a handsome woman, and did the honors of her salon with a truly royal grace. On the days when she was at home she received her guests in a little boudoir hung with purple damask and filled with pictures by the greatest artists of the day. This boudoir opened on her bedroom, a magnificent room hung with blue silk and furnished in the Louis XVI. style. The cabinet de travail of M. de Girardin was in striking contrast with the luxuriousness of his wife's apartments—not that its appointments were any less sumptuous, but because it was severely simple. This cabinet de travail was hung with heavy black velvet, and the only decoration on the walls beside the cases filled with handsomely bound volumes, was a large portrait of a handsome child, an only daughter, whose death just as she was passing into womanhood, was a blow from which her father never recovered. On more ceremonious occasions Mme. de Girardin received in a grand salon decorated and furnished in the somewhat severe Louis XIII. style, with a vast mantelpiece that towered up to the ceiling, and wide sofas of red plush around the walls. From this opened a gallery filled with rare pictures and statuary, the gem of which was a magnificent life-size statue of Rachel.

PROMINENT VISITORS.

But of more interest than salon, cabinet de travail or boudoir were the persons who were to be met there. Among them was Emile Olivier, the first minister of the liberal empire that Napoleon attempted to found in order to save his crown, and to the support of which Girardin, in spite of his life long republicanism, consented to lend the support of his pen. All the ministers of that famous cabinet used to be frequent guests at Saint Gratien, and all the members of the diplomatic corps were only too glad to avail themselves of the opportunities which were to be found there for catching those little and seemingly unimportant words that play so great a part in European diplomacy. The most constant of all these was the Chevalier Nigra, the brilliant representative of Italy, and it was while under the roof of M. de Girardin that he discovered many of those state secrets which he is accused of having betrayed to Bismarck. As Madame de Girardin was a very pious woman, it may be that the pleasure of talking religion with her had quite as much to do as had diplomacy with the regular attendance of Cardinal Chigi, the papal nuncio, at her receptions. Of the literary celebrities for which, in the days of the first Mme. de Girardin, this salon was famous, there was still remaining toward the end of the second empire Emil Angier, Arsene Houssaye, Meilhac and Halevy. Later the statesmen of the third republic made their appearance, and the whole of that youthful and ardent tribe of writers and artists which the last twelve years have produced; and no foreign prince or potentate who passed through Paris ever failed to beg for a presentation into the salon of M. de Girardin, which one of them said seemed to him to be the quintessence of civilization. Music was not as much cultivated as conversation in the salon of M. de Girardin, but what music was to be heard there was of the very highest order. Mme. de Lagrange, Mme. Carvalho, Nilsson, Mme. Krauss, Mons. Viardot, are among those who used to sing there to the accompaniment of such masters as Gounod, Delibes, Saint Saens and J. Cohen. On great occasions the world of fashion sent its most prominent representatives, Mme. Salomon de Rothschild, the Princess Troubetskoy, Mme. Canrobert, and there was always a flying detachment of the most charming of the ladies of the American colony, including Mrs. Wagner and a beautiful daughter, Mrs. and Miss Bates and the beautiful Miss Radcliffe. But that salon has now passed away forever, and the auctioneer's hammer has scattered all the rare paintings, statues and bronzes in which its master used to find so much delight.

A SPECULATING ABBE.

All abbes are supposed to be good men, but sometimes quite the contrary is the case. In the good old days when the Bourbons ruled in France, it was not at all uncommon for a lively and lusty abbe to be the lover of one of the grande dames of the court; but that, along with many other good things, has long since gone out of fashion, and if there is any billing and cooing between priests and petticoats, it is done in France sub rosa, just as it is in other countries, and we hear little, if anything, about it. But if the French priesthood of the nineteenth are in this respect better than those of the eighteenth century, when, if we may credit the racy memoirs of those days, they did not take the trouble to hide their licentious doings under a bushel, those of to-day are quite as much men of their times as their predecessors were, and as the lust for wealth is the besetting sin of these latter days, it is to that form of lust that they would seem to be addicted. This reflection has been suggested to my mind by the exploits of Monsieur L'Abbe Sicard, one of the priests of the parish of Notre Dame des Bonnes Nouvelles whose dark ways and tricks are now under investigation by the criminal authorities of this capital. The abbe is one of those active, energetic priests who mixes a good deal in society, and who has the oily, insinuating and obsequious manners that are so often found in gentlemen of his cloth. One of the favorite lounging places of Monsieur l'Abbe has been the stock exchange, and he was not at all averse to taking a flyer in Panama, Suez or any other of the stocks that have a fluctuating tendency. His flyers of late have not panned out satisfactorily, and as his salary as first vicaire was insufficient to keep up his margins with the brokers, he hit on a means of raising the wind, which not only shows that he is a man of genius in financial matters, but also illustrates the old saying that all the fools are not yet dead. To carry out his little game the abbe needed an accomplice, and he found just the one he wanted in a young Parisian gentleman and the grandson of a deceased statesman of prominence. This young man was presented everywhere by the priest as an orphan who was soon to come into a handsome estate, and for whom he had arranged a marriage with a wealthy heiress, with a dot of 5,000,000 francs. On the strength of these assertions the abbe induced a wealthy banker, Mr. Hoss, to advance his protege the sum of 60,000 francs. He also induced a fashionable dressmaker to advance to the same person 16,000 francs, on the condition that she was to have the making of the trousseau, and that she might include that sum in her bill. A jeweler was found who was confiding enough to part with diamonds and other jewelry to the amount of 20,000 francs, which the young gentleman has a desire to present to his fiancee. As the marriage did not come off, the banker, the dressmaker and the jeweler began to be afraid that there might be something wrong, and they at last ended by doing what they should have begun with; that is, by going to the young lady whose name had been given them by the abbe as the fiancee of his young friend. This young lady, Mlle. Marson, was an heiress and the man who gets her will get with her a dot of 2,000,000, but it happens that not only is she not engaged to the abbe's protege, but she has never even heard of him or the abbe! The victims began by going to the archbishop, who could not help them, so they went to the correctional police court, where the matter was turned over to one of the judges d'instruction, as the officials are termed who, in this country, investigate criminal charges and do the work of the grand jury in deciding whether there is or is not a case for the courts to take hold of. As the judge d'instruction has decided that there is something in the charge, Monsieur l'Abbe and his accomplice are now under bail to answer at the next term of court to the accusation of cheating by false pretenses.

A MANAGERIAL SHARK.

The performance at the Gymnase theater came to an abrupt end last night. The spectators, who had assembled to hear Madame Caverlet, received back their money and were sent away at the conclusion of the first piece. After a long wait the stage manager came before the curtain and announced: "Mr. Marais having refused to continue to play the role of Caverlet, the money will be returned at the box office." He had hardly got the words out of his lips when Marais himself appeared and declared that he did not refuse to play. The audience waited to find out whether the performance was going on or not, and like all French audiences amused themselves by making as much noise as possible. This lasted over an hour, when the lights were turned out, and for more than another hour there was a surging crowd around the ticket office and innumerable disputes, in which the commissaire de police had to interfere, before every one got back his money and went away. According to Manager Koning, the only side which has yet been heard, the actor refused to play the role on the ground that it was not in his line, which is that of a jeune premier, and that for him to play it would injure him professionally, and the manager adds that this is only an excuse in order to get out of a contract, which binds him to the Gymnase for several years to come, in order to become the leading man with Sarah Bernhardt at the Porte St. Martin. But those who know Koning feel very sure that there is something more in the little incident than he is willing to admit. There was probably never a theatrical manager who has had more law suits with the artists of his troupe than this same Koning, and there is none who has a greater skill in devising iron-clad contracts which place his pensionnaires at his mercy. It is generally among the ladies of the profession that Koning finds his victims, and as a sample of his manner of proceeding I may cite the following recent case: When he took the Gymnase Mlle. Tessandier was the leading lady of the company, and knowing she desired to leave, Koning begged her to stay, offering her a long engagement, but inserting in the contract a penalty of $4,000 in case she should leave him before its termination. Months passed on and Mlle. Tessandier was not cast for any of the new pieces that were brought out at the Gymnase. One day she was offered a short engagement at the Odeon, and had to pay Koning 1,000 francs a month and relinquish her salary before she could get his permission to accept it. He then made matters so uncomfortable for her at the theater that she determined to leave him at all risks. Koning agreed to let her go for 10,000 francs cash and an equal sum in notes, and it was only the other day that the furniture and wardrobe of the actress were sold by the sheriff in order to pay these notes. It was only recently that the courts decided a law suit between this same Koning and Victor Capoul, who sang for a few months at the Renaissance under the management of the former, and, as usual, the manager got the better of the actor. A case similar to that of Mlle. Tessandier was that of Mlle. Leonide Leblanc, and as the lady has a wealthy friend, who is a prominent member of a family that once sat on the French throne, Mr. Koning made a clear 40,000 francs by the transaction. Mlle. Julien, Mlle. Duverger and M. Achard are among the best known of the many victims of Koning's managerial career. It is therefore more than probable that Marais' contract calls for a handsome sum of forfeit money and that Koning has so arranged matters that it will either have to be paid or that Marais will have to consent to a big reduction in his salary.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

The difficulties attending all efforts for an economical administration of governmental affairs are made palpable by the intense opposition disclosed to the consolidation of revenue districts. Though acting in strict accordance with the law of congress, which rendered it necessary to discharge a few surplus officials, the president, and Secretary Folger have been criticised without the slightest reason, and pestered day and night by telegrams and personal solicitations from politicians to violate or evade the law for the purpose of saving a few useless officials from being relegated to private life. But happily the administration is firm and the reduction will take place.

Professor Elisha Gray, the electrician n a letter to the Chicago Tribune and Professor Swing, on the Racine tornado and tornadoes generally, says they are short lived and expend their force in from one to fifty miles ordinarily, but sometimes retaining their force for longer distances, even to a hundred miles. In regard to their character he says: "The immediate cause of the terrific force of the tornado is electricity," and farther he states: We can manufacture miniature tornadoes in the laboratory with no other force than electricity, that show all the characteristics of their larger brethren." This is in direct opposition to the vacuum theory so called of which so much has been written, though the latter has much that is at least plausible in its favor.

The investigation which is now going on in Washington of the doings of chief architect Hill of the treasury department, is laying before the public and the adminstration some valuable information, which will be likely to stop important leaks in the future, in the way of the purchase of building and other material at several times its value. The mystery as to how it costs the government about three times as much as it does other parties to build anything, is being laid bare, and hereafter, perhaps, it may be able to do such things at no more than twice their actual cost. It is the fashion of a certain class of newspapers and public men th sneer and scout at all such investigations and discredit those engaged in such work, but the great masses of people of both political parties take a very different view of things. They want honest and economical adminstration and joyfully hail every indication of progress in that direction.

Iceland is represented as almost in a starving condiion. The loss of stock during the terrible winter of a year ago was the greatest known in the history of Iceland, save during the eruption of Hecla in the 17th century; and about $500,000 worth of stock perished. This is a terrible loss of working capital to a naturally poor people of but 70,000 souls; and it must mean added poverty for some years till the flocks can be increased by their natural growth. The only solution of the problem presenting itself to the Icelandic people seems to be the desertion of the country; and there is a movement for a large migration to America, particularly to Dakota. But money is so scarce in Iceland that he people cannot even realize on their personal effects and land.

The June rise of the Mississippi river, sometimes regarded as traditional, is a reality this year. The great river has spread itself over vast sections of fertile country in Missouri, Illinois and Arkansas, and the damage to property is estimated by millions, to say nothing of a vast amount of suffering. The flood equals those of 1858 and 1844. Over two thousand homes in the neighborhood of St. Louis are rendered uninhabitable. The sufferers will not be able to raise anything of consequence on the drowned fields during the present agricultural year. If the water goes down in the next two weeks a little cattle corn might be raised for stock feeding and fodder, but this poor recourse is entirely inadequate to supply the deficiency caused by the flood. Under the most favorable circumstances about all that the flooded farmers can do is to carry their stock through the coming winter, and hence the need of assistance for themselves. The people of the upper Mississippi and its tributaries were happily exempted from the floods pouring down upon the country below.

Eggs By The Acre.

From the Santa Barbara Press.

Last Tuesday afternoon Captain A. Larco, the well-known fisherman, returned to port after a five days' cruise among the islands off the coast. His voyage was something out of the ordinary way and his route was one seldom taken by him, or, in fact, any other coaster. The most interesting portion of Captain Larco's story was his description of an island covered with eggs. He says that a short distance from San Miguel Island, standing out lone and solitary in the Pacific Ccean, there is a rock with a surface of about three acres. The sides are precipitous and almost inaccessable except during calm weather. While becalmed near the rock he visited it and was amazed at the scene presented to vision. The island is covered with a layer of guano, in which sea fowls of all description were found laying or incubating their eggs. The surface appeared to be almost entirely covered with eggs, principally those of the sea gulls, shaggs and a small bird known as the salt-water duck. He says it was difficult to walk without treading on the eggs. He brought away several bushels of these eggs. The shagg's eggs are of a light-blue color and somewhat smaller than a domestic hen's eggs. The gulls eggs are somewhat larger in size, light brown, spotted with black dots.

Larco says he could easily load a ship with those eggs from this island, but as there is no market for them here they are not worth gathering.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

An important inference case has been pending before the United States patent office for some years involving the right to the telephone receiver now in general use. The parties in the case are James W. McDonough of Chicago, Messrs. Bell, Edison, Grey, Noelker and several others. It is understood that the decision has been rendered, but that it is veing surreptitiously printed to avoid publication before it is officially promulgated. It is rumored, however, upon pretty high authority that Mr. McDonough will be awarded the patent for the telephone receiver. The other inventors will each be awarded a proper share for their respective improvements. The decision is based on the fact that McDonough is the first one in the country who made a telephone receiver having a magnet coil and diaphegm, which was constructed in 1869. He is also the first one who made the telephone transmitter, which he constructed in 1874.

The following are the latest posta changes: Postoffices Discontinued—Belcher's Ford, Spink county, Dak.; Terre Haute, Decatur county, Iowa. Special service discontinued—Belford, Dak., Riley, Dak., from July 15; Osvata, Polk county, Minn., from June 30. Postmasters, new bonds accepted—William H. Humphrey, Iroquois, Dak., $4,000; E. F. Clarke, Bancroft, Iowa, $4,000. Mail messenger service established—Iowa, Britt, Hancock county, from Minneapolis & St. Louis railway, June 28. Star services changes—Dakota; route 35,165, Huron to Plankington, from July 16, embrace Riley next after Huron; route 35,244, Mitchell to Elmer, from July 16, embrace Belford next after Leet. The president has appointed the following postmasters: F. D. Conger, Washington, D. C. (Conger is a son of Senator Conger of Michigan); Charles W. Dicks, Detroit City, Minn., and Duke Whall, Lanesborough, Minn.

A point of importance to pensioners has just been decided by the acting secretary of the interior in the case of the application of John R. Collet for an increase of pension. The decision construes the law of June 18, 1874, defining total and permanent helplessness, to mean permanent injury, requiring the personal attendance and aid of another person, and as those conditions were found in the present case, the application was granted. This is a reversal of the previous decisions of the department.

It is understood that further changes will be made in the various departments at Washington on or about July 1. This action on the part of heads of departments in thus forestalling the operation of the civil service law is very severely censured by reformers, who say that the recent appointments and promotions and those yet to be made might very well have been postponed for another month, when they could have been made under civil service rules.

Secretary Chandler has decided to permit Commander Frederick Smith, who was court-martialed for duplicating pay accounts to resign. The secretary said, that although Commander Smith had been found guilty of duplicating his accounts in more than one instance, he thought his actions not such as should prevent his being allowed to resign.

GENERAL NEWS NOTES.

1 Southwestern Kansas, or more properly the lower Arkansas valley, is in the midst of harvest. This section, including the counties of Sedgwick, Butler, Cowley and Sumner, never had finer crop of wheat. These counties will cut about 250,000 acres, or from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 bushels. The oat crop, which is ripening rapidly, will be simply immense. The counties named have nearly 450,000 acres of growing corn.

The supreme court of Ohio gave out its opinion in over 5,000 words on the Scott liquor tax law, holding it valid and constitutional, except the second section, wherein it is held not to apply to leases executed prior to the passage of the act, as no contracts made can be violated.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

A desperate attempt was made in a carriage on a railway train running from Calais to Paris to murder and rob Mr. Witchborne, an English clergyman. The murderer attacked Mr. Witchborne with a chisel, stabbing him five times. The assassin tried to make his escape when the train arrived at Amiens, but was captured after a terrific struggle. The wounds of the clergyman are very dangerous, and it is not expected he will survive them. The assailant was also an Englishman. The would-be assassin attempted suicide by shooting himself with a revolver, and now lies in a precarious condition. Rev. Mr. Witchboroe is recovering.

The Failures of the Week and Quarter.

Bradstreet's Journal furnishes the following: There were 165 failures in the United States reported to Bradstreet's during the week ending June 30th.,—thirteen less than the preceeding week, twelve more than the corresponding week of 1882, and sixty-two more than the same week of 1881.

The number of merchantile failures reported to Bradstreet's for the second quarter of 1883 shows a considerable decrease as compared with the first three months of the year, but a striking increase when comparson is made with the second quarter of 1882. The average number of failures occurring each week in the first quarter of 1883 was 245; in the second quarter 162; in the first quarter of 1882, 165; in the second quarter of 1882, 115. As previously pointed out, the 1st of January being the date of balance sheets and general settlements, the number of failures in the last and first quarters of each year is uniformly larger than the other quarters.

The Careys Coming to America.

London Cable: The families of Peter and James Carey left Dublin for Liverpool on the 26th. Peter is with them in England, and a Dublin letter states that James Carey left Dublin recently for England, and that he will sail next week for Nova Scotia, where he will determine whether he will settle in Manitoba or British Columbia. Carey's house has been without a police guard since the 27th, and it is completely coated with mud thrown at it by passers-by.

The National Miller's Association.

At the annual meeting in Chicago of the National Miller's association several questions as to the good of the organization and future movements were discussed, after which the annual election of officers occurred, resulting as follows:

President—J. Christian, Minneapolis.

Second Vice President—Homer Baldwin, Youngstown, Ohio.
Secretary and Treasurer—S. H. Seaman, Milwaukee.

The subject of rates of transportation with a view to overcoming the advantage to grain shippers who could hold and ship at most favorable seasons, was referred to a committee. A member who lately returned from Europe reported large quantities of flour in store in foreign countries and crops prospering unusually well. He predicted that fancy prices would not rule for 'flour the current year. Reports on crops from their section of the country by other members indicated about an average production, this concluded the deliberations of the associations and they adjourned.

PUGILISTIC PARSONS.

Two Ministers of Hartford, Ct., Have a Desperate Fight, Fall Into a Baptismal Font and Each Attempts to Drown the Other.

HARTFORD, Ct., Special Telegram, June 27—Rev. Dr. Parker and the Rev. Mr. Everts indulged in a fierce fight in the baptismal font of the South Baptist church Sunday afternoon. For a long time Congregationalism has been striving to capture the church. Rev. Mr. Everts is pastor of the much coveted prize, while Rev. Dr. Parker is the leader of Congregationalism. It seems that Dr. Parker conceived the purpose of baptizing a score or more of young children in the baptistry of the South Baptist. A procession was formed. At the head of the procession was a double quartette led by a hand organ which had recently been repaired at considerable cost. Besides nearly 200 children in the procession, there were fully that number of adults, men and women, mostly the parents of the children. The procession entered and took possession. By this time the sacristan had notified Rev. Mr. Everts, who quickly sent for the deacons. Meanwhile Rev. Dr. Parker and his crowd had turned on the water, which was rapidly filling the great tank used for baptisms. Children were being prepared for receiving the rite and Rev. Dr. Parker was excitedly spurring on his followers in what he called a battle for congregationalism. Presently Rev. Mr. Everts arrived, followed by his deacons. He protested with Rev. Parker against the outrageous intrusion, but the reverend doctor simply replied that he was determined to finish what he had come to do. Before the great tank had filled, the spacious edifice was resounding with inquiries, protestations and recriminations. The invading party could not be persuaded to leave. While the women and elders of the two congregations were of the place, the two ministers carried on a bitter war of words between themselves, Dr. Parker proceeding all the while with baptizing the children, who stood about with blanched faces and forms that shook with fright. Suddenly a struggle between the two sides broke out in earnest. An indescribable scrimmage took place. The shrieks of the children, the wailings of infants and the imploring of women mingled with the angry cries of pastors and officers of the contending congregation. Many women fainted, and many had their Sunday clothes almost torn off them. Dr. Parker and Mr. Evarts had a terrible struggle. They beat each other and tore each others hair frightfully, and finally fell into the immense tank, firmly grasping each other. Each strove to drown the other. So busy were the other fighters that they could not observe the accident that happened to their pastors. Some of the peace makers turned their attention to the struggling pastors. It was found impossible to tear them apart, so they were taken out, locked in a fierce embrace, and both unconscious. They were finally separated, though they clung to each other with the tenacity of drowning men, and resuscitated. After a little talking the ministers were reconciled, and it was a source of great rejoicing to the Baptists that Dr. Parker had been completely immersed. That several were not killed in the fearful struggle is a miracle. Many are confined to their bed from the effect of fright. Both clergymen are in a sad condition mentally and physically. The unfortunate affair has scandalized the whole Christian community.

Dyspeptics and Durg Stories.

Dr. Felix L. Oswald, writing upon "Remedies from Nature," in the Popular Science Monthly for July, says:

But nine out of ten dyspeptics resort to the drug store. They get a bottle of "tonic bitters." They try Dr. Quack's "Dyspepsia Elixir." They try a "blue pill," in the hope of rousing nature, as it were, to a sense of her proper duty.

Now, what such "tonics," can really do for them is this: They goad the system into the transient and abnormal activity incident to the necessity of expelling a virulent poison. With the accomplishment of that purpose the exertion ceases, and the ensuing exhaustion is worse than the first by just as much as the poison fever has robbed the system of a larger or smaller share of the little remaining strength. The stimulant has wasted the organic energy which it seemed to revive. "But," says the patient, "if a repetition of the dose can relieve the second reaction, would the result not be preferable to the languor of the unstimulated system? Wouldn't it be the best plan to let me support my strength by sticking to my patent tonic?"

Yes, it would be very convenient, especially in times of scarcity, if a starving horse could be supported by the daily application of a patent spur. It would save both oats and oaths. Even a fastidious nag could not help acknowledging the pungency of the goad. But it so happens that surfed horses are somewhat short-lived, though at first the diet seems to act like a charm. For a day or two the drug stimulates the activity of the digestive organs as well as of the mental faculties, but the subsequent prostration is so intolerable that the patient soon chooses the alternative of another poison fever. Before long the pleasant phase of the febrile process becomes shorter, and the reaction more severe; the jaded system is less able to respond to the goad, and, in order to make up for the difference, the dose of the stimulant has to be steadily increased. The invalid becomes a bondman to the drug store, and hugs the chain that drags him down to the slavery of a confirmed poison habit.

Circumstances may differ. A dyspeptic who intends to make his own quietus within a month or two, and in the meanwhile has a certain amount of work to finish, would be justified in stimulating his working capacities by all means, in order to improve to the utmost whatever chances of mundane activity remains to him. But he who intends to stay has to make up his mind that recovery cannot be hoped for that he has not only discontinued his drug, but expiated the burden of sin which the stimulant outrage has added to the original cause of the disease. Nature has to overcome the effects both of malnutrition and malpractice. The drug has complicated the disease.

HOW STAGES ARE ROBBED.

A Lady Relates Her Experience in Nevada

From the Sacramento (Cal.) Record-Union.

Mrs. Pratt, wife of Superintendent R. H. Pratt, who arrived home yesterday from Sierra Valley, in addition to the mountain air, had, while traveling in a stage between Randolph and Truckee, the enjoyable and impressive experience of capture by a stage robber. There were three men, two ladies, and two children in the party besides the driver, who were taking in the mountain scenery and expatiating upon the climate, when a masked man, decorated with a double barreled shotgun, which was at full cock, and with a sword bayonet attached at the muzzle, a revolver and a hatchet, stepped out from behind a tree standing by the track and demanded the driver to halt. His persuasive command was oebyed, when he told the driver to throw out the express box and open it. The driver replied that he couldn't, as it was chained down and locked. This was "too thin" for the party just then in command, and with a show of compelling obedience in a summary manner, the driver got the box out. The robber directed the inmates of the stage to get out and stand on the other side of the road, which they did. The driver then, under instructions, broke a large rock upon the treasure box in trying to break it open, but not succeeding, the robber threw his hatchet to him, and after considerable effort with this he succeeded in getting it open. The robber then directed that he should bring the box under a tree by the roadside, which he did, and then returned, under orders minutely given, to the stage. The robber then cooly but cautiously laid down his gun by the side of the box, and getting down upon his knees took out what coin there was, and went through the letters and papers with the utmost coolness and deliberation, not appearing to be in the least hurry. Coming across two Chinese checks, he swore in a foreign dialect, and said: "These checks I can make no account." Having abstracted $272 in coin and papers, he kindly replaced in the box all the papers and articles he did not want, and permitted the driver to take it into custody again and the passengers to resume their places in the stage. He then said politely: "Good evening to you all," and ordered the driver to drive on, while he left the road and passed over the hill, stopping to see that the stage passed quietly along without instituting measures looking to his apprehension. The passengers were not molested as to their valuables, which was fortunate, as there were a great number of fine gold watches in the party, besides several hundred dollars in money.

Stories About Talleyrand.

Mr. Greville's most interesting stories are about Talleyrand, whom he knew very well. Stories about Talleyrand are almost always good; it is difficult to remember whether or not they are new. Some verses of his, written when he was a priest and in love, are mentioned, but not printed. "He was very proud of a definition he had made of "L' Amour." "Love is a reality in the realm of the imagination." It does not sound much to be proud of—in English. The anecdote about M. de Narbonne is not new, but it is good. This gentleman was very tedious, and one day, when driving with Talleyrand across the Pont Neuf, was particularly dreary. Talleyrand saw a man yawning at a distance, and said to his companion: "Don't speak so loud, we are overheard." He said of Lady Holland, "She pretends to know every thing, to make herself of importance, and when she does not know she invents"—the consequences of her invention being ill-natured stories. Napoleon, according to Talleyrand, had moments in which he played the moralist among the ladies of his court. The Emperor thought the conduct of the Marechale Ney "trop fort," which gives one an unholy desire to know what the Marechale could possibly have been doing. Madame de Genlis enraged Madame de Stael (and no wonder) by saying, "Si Madame de Stael avait ete elevee, elle aurait ete tres superieur." Talleyrand said that Louis XVIII used to cut irreverent jokes on Sunday afternoon, which was very ungrateful conduct in that monarch. Otherwise Louis XVIII was very agreeable and well read, particularly well acquainted with Horace, and extremely proud of his beauty, and kissed the king's boots as if he were the pope; but etiquette demanded that they should be said to have done so, because a town countil does not stand on the same level of dignity as the Cortes, whose members are supposed to kiss hands when they take leave. The three letters B. S. P. (beso sus pies), which mean "I kiss your feet," are still used by gentlemen in Spain when signing letters addressed to ladies, and by subjects to their king. The letters B. S. M. (baso sus manos), which are used by men writing to men, and by ladies to ladies, would seem too cavalier from a gentleman to a lady, and downright impertinence from a subject to his sovereign.

One of the chief reasons of the Duke d'Aosta's unpopularity during the brief reign which he closed with a voluntary abdication, was that he would take no pains to study the complicated etiquette of the grace with which he took off and put on his hat. In this respect his Majesty considered himself the most accomplished man in his own dominions. Napoleon, oddly enough, was very fond of theology. It was not so much that he was truly pious or a devout believer, but that he had a natural taste for theological study. His library was peculiarly rich in books of divinity. So far there was a certain resemblance between the Emperor and Lord Byron. He kept three bishops with whom he used to argue on these serious and difficult topics. This was almost culpable luxury, and it shows how self-indulgent the Emperor was and could afford to be, that not one or two bishops could satisfy his curiosity about divine things. Talleyrand admitted that he himself was "not wholly destitute of religious belief," so open was the mind of this really clever man. In earlier days he had some very odd experience of revolutionary society. He was at a meeting of the Directoire when Barras gave Carnot the lie; the lie was retorted, not courteously, and Barras replied in the style of an unpolished coal heaver. "I had never seen anything like it," said Talleyrand.—London News.

Concerning the Beauty for Whom Senator Fair Shattered All His Household Gods.

From the Peru (Ind.) Republican.

Reference has been made lately to the unhappy domestic relations of Senator Fair, of Nevada, which culminated in a decree of divorce and alimony for his wife. The girl in the case, who seems to have completely captivated the old man with his $10,000,000 is "Annie Carpenter" a plump and handsome blonde, about 27 years of age, with crushed strawberry hair. Annie has a history, and so has her mother and her aunt. She is the daughter of J. H. Smith, who was the editor and proprietor of the Peru Free Press about thirty years ago. In 1856 Mrs. Smith left her husband in Peru and accompanied Mr. and Mrs. John T. Stevens to California—or at least was a passenger on the same ship with them. Mrs. Smith went to the home of her sister, Mrs. Schultz, also a Peruvian, who was then living with her husband and keeping hotel at Young's Hill, a mining town not far from San Francisco. Very soon after her arrival there her daughter was born and christened "Annie." Mrs. Smith obtained a divorce from the husband she abandoned in Peru and married a miner named Carpenter, whose name her child by the former marriage was permitted to assume. She left Caapenter, obtained a divorce from him, and for a while had employment in Washington. After returning west she was remarried to Carpenter. The little daughter Anna went to live with her aunt, Mrs. Shultz, who was very fond of her. Mrs. Shultz became a member of Colonel Baker's family in San Francisco, and, taking advantage of her husband's absence in a mining town, procured a divorce and accompanied Colonel Baker to Washington Soon afterward Colonel Tom Fitch, silver-tongued orator of the Pacific slope, became enamored of Mrs. Shultz and married her after having procured a divorce from his wife.

Like her mother and her aunt, Anna Carpenter has her charms. Some time ago a San Francisco doctor or dentist fell desperately in love with her, although he was at the time the husband of one wife. Through the influence of Colonel Fitch he procured a divorce and married his new love at Virginia City. Afterward the wronged wife had the proceedings of court granting him a divorce set aside and this annulled his marriage with Anna Carpenter. She has since made conquest of larger game. Her relations with Senator Fair were the grounds for the divorce recently obtained by Mrs. Fair. The ten-millionaire is now free to marry his bonnie Annie, who is said to be pretty as well as vivacious.

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

Hubbard, Gilman, Von Baumbach, Kittelson, Hahn and Baker the Republican Nominees.

The Republican State Convention was held at St. Paul on the 27th. Ex-Gov. C. K. Davis, chairman of the State Central Committee called the convention to order and H. A. Castle acted as secretary.

Mr. Z. B. Clarke nominated for temporary chairman C. D. Gilfillan, and Russell Blakely presented the name of ex-Gov. John S. Pillsbury. Messrs. Flower and Clarke were appointed tellers.

Capt. Blakely stated that it had been customary to call the roll, the chairman of each delegation announcing the preference of his delegation, and made a motion to that effect. Mr. Clarke moved to amend that the convention proceed to a ballot. The call of the roll resulted in 131 ayes and 100 nays, so the amendment was adopted.

The ballot resulted:

John S. Pillsbury......96 | C. D. Gilfillan......140

Mr. Gilfillan was declared temporary chairman of the convention, and without formalities he proceeded to business. O. B. Gould of Winona was nominated by Col. Hicks for secretary, and A. D. Berkins was named by Z. B. Clarke. On motion of Col. Hicks the two were declared elected by acclamation. Mr. M. E. Clapp moved the appointment of a committee of thirteen, one from each judicial district and one at large, as a committee on credentials.

THE COMMITTEES.

Mr. Washburn moved the appointment of a similar committee on platform, and Mr. Crosby for a similar committee on permanent organization, Mark H. Dunnell having meantime moved that the temporary organization be the permanent organization, and been pronounced out of order by Col. Hicks and declared out of order by the chair. The two motions were adopted without dissent. The chair appointed as such committees the following:

Committee on Credentials—Stanford Newel of Ramsey, M. E. Clapp of Otter Tail, H. G. Hicks of Hennepin, George M. Seymour of Washington, L. Z. Roders of Le Sueur, C. H. Conkey of Fillmore, Mons Grinager of Nobles, M. J. Daniels of Olmsted, Philip Plaisance of Rice, Joseph Bobeleter of Brown, W. W. Johnston of Freeborn, Marcus Johnson of Kandiyohi, A. H. Truax of Dakota.

Committee on Platform and Resolutions—W. D. Washburn of Hennepin, Russell Blakeley of Ramsey, Thomas Simpson of Winona, C. J. Coghlan of Lac qui Parle, Robert Taylor of Dodge, H. R. Denny of Carver, J. N. Searles of Washington, A. Amundson of Nicollet, James O'Brien of Houston, J. H. McHench of Martin, H. C. Kendall of St. Louis, W. F. Boulton of Sherburne, John S. Pillsbury of Hennepin.

Committee on Permanent Organization—A. M. Crosby of Nobles, F. B. Van Hoesen of Douglas, Paul C. Sletten of Polk, A. B. Robbins of Kandiyohi, J. N. Stacy of Wright, Peter Bohland of Ramsey, Frank Gifford of Scott, H. W. Cannon of Washington, Mart Chandler of Goodhue, E. S. Corser of Hennepin, A. Roy of Mower, E. S. Warner of Blue Earth, C. W. Thompson of Faribault.

The convention then took a recess until 3:15.

The whole afternoon was given up to the committee on credentials to settle contests, and it was not until evening that the report was presented.

The temporary organization was, upon the report of the committee, made the permanent organization.

THE PLATFORM.

Hon. W. D. Washburn, from the committee on platform, submitted the report of the committee as follows:

The Republicans of Minnesota, in State convention assembled, do adopt and proclaim the following declaration of principles:

First—We reaffirm the doctrines of the party as expressed in previous State and national platforms. That while we take a just pride in the Republican triumphs of the past, we hold these to be assurances of our purpose to achieve the best results for the future. A party which has given freedom and equal rights to all citizens, which gave such potential aid in the reconstruction of the Union, in preserving the faith and credit of the nation, in securing the reduction of the national debt, in providing a currency of perfect safety, in reducing the burthens of general taxation: these are the pledges of safety for its future conduct. We believe in maintaining a system of internal revenue, levied upon articles of luxury such as whisky and tobacco, and exempting the prime necessaries of life; together with a system of duties upon imports so applied as to provide revenue for the necessary expenses of the government, and so adjusted as to encourage the development of the manufacturing and labor interests of the whole country.

We are in favor of a genuine system of reform of the civil service, based on the appointment to office, after proper examination, of men of capability, honesty and fidelity; and we commend the civil service law passed by a Republican congress and approved by a Republican executive as a step in the right direction.

We approve the principle of making liberal appropriations by congress for internal improvements, for the protection and development of the navigation of our national streams and harbors. We demand the continuation of such appropriations especially for the benefit of the Mississippi river from its mouth to its sources under the plans adopted by the Mississippi river commission and the engineer corps of the war department.

The administration of the general government under President Arthur has been wise and conservative, and the affairs of our own State have been conducted in a prudent, honest and economical manner; its financial obligations are on a sound basis; the rate of interest and taxation is low; the public school system and the various institutions of the State are well managed and enjoy the confidence of the people.

Fifth—That, recognizing the right of the people to a fair hearing upon all questions affecting their interests, and to effect, by lawful means, any changes in the constitution of the State which they shall deem expedient, not intending hereby to commit the party to any policy upon the question of constitutional prohibition of the liquor traffic, we are in favor of giving a free and fair opportunity to the people of the State to vote upon this, as well as upon other questions, whenever a respectable proportion of its voters shall petition for the privilege of exercising the right.

That it is, in the opinion of this convention, the duty of congress, as an act of justice to the soldiers of our commonwealth, to restore the arrearage clause to the pension act by the re-enactment of that law; and we do hereby respectfully ask and most earnestly recommend to that body its early restoration.

The report of the committee was adopted without dissent.

Mr. Washburn reported also the following resolution without recommendation.

Resolved, That we deprecate as suicidal the increasing tendency of members of the Republican party to labor to defeat and thwart the plainly expressed will of the party, as that will has been properly, fairly and honestly expressed in its time-honored and approved form and usages.

Mr. Barto moved to lay the resolution on the table.

A Delegate—The resolution is vague. Will some one explain it.

The Chair—It hasn't any father. It is presented at the request of some one.

A Delegate—If it has no father then let's send it to an orphan asylum.

The motion to lay upon the table was carried by a vote of 148 to 92.

Capt. Blakeley asked if he had a right, under this resolution, to repudiate the nomination of this convention for governor.

Gen. McLaren—You have, certainly.

Capt. Blakeley attempted to proceed, but was met with hisses and applause, which drowned his words, and was called to order by the chair, there being no question before the convention.

Mr. Day of Martin, Mr. Cannon of Washington and Mr. Robbins of Kandiyohi were appointed tellers:

THE GOVERNORSHIP.

Mr. Martin Chandler of Goodhue county rose to nominate for governor Lucian F. Hubbard, H. E. Barron rose to second the nomination, and Mr. Washburn moved that the nomination be made by acclamation, which motion was adopted with but a single negative vote.

A. K. Finseth moved the appointment of a committee of three to wait upon Gov. Hubbard to inform him of his nomination. The chair appointed as such committee Messrs. Finseth, Rogers and Clarke.

For lieutenant governor the names of S. J. Comstock of Clay county, J. N. Strong of Wright, Lt. Gov. Gilman of Benton, Stanford Newell of Ramsey, W. R. Kenyon of Steele, H. S. Day of Fillmore and C. H. Buckham of Benton, were presented by their respective friends.

GOV. HUBBARD'S ACCEPTANCE.

At this juncture the committee appeared accompanied by Gov. Hubbard.

Gov. Hubbard was received with moderate applause and said:

Gentlemen of the Convention: I am deeply sensible of the honor you do me in your tender of a renomination to the office of chief magistrate of this great State. The expression of confidence and approval implied by your action here to-day inspires me with sentiments of appreciation and gratitude quite beyond my ability to express. It has been my highest aspiration while discharging the duties of the executive office to impress the people of this commonwealth with the belief that I was striving to give them an honest, an efficient and clean administration, and that its responsibilities and obligations were being met and discharged with a fair measure of success. It is probable that I have made some mistakes in the course of my administration of the multifarious and sometimes complex duties of the office, but as it is an attribute of our common humanity to sometimes err, I feel that I may command your charitable judgment upon such of my official acts as may have been fairly subject to criticism. I thank you, gentlemen of the convention, for this handsome endorsement, and if it shall be the judgment of the people of the State that I shall retain the trust I hold, and which you now tender me for another term, I shall hope, aided by the experience of the past, to bring to the discharge of its duties a riper judgment and a more thorough efficiency than heretofore, and to surrender it unsullied to my successor.

THE INFORMAL BALLOT.

The informal ballot resulted as follows:

Charles A. Gilman	95	J. N. Stacy	23
S. G. Comstock	44	C. B. Buckman	18
W. R. Kenyon	25
Stanford Newel	15	Total	245
H. G. Day	25

Pending the count of the vote, Mr. Simpson moved the appointment of a committee of thirteen to nominate a State central committee of thirteen. The motion was adopted.

THE FORMAL BALLOT.

	First Formal.	Second Formal.
Gilman	111	127
Comstock	70	103
Kenyon	19	9
Day	19	....
Buckman	....	....
S. D. Peterson	3	....
Newell	9	9
Stacy	12	....
Total	243	248

Necessary choice, 22.

Mr. Knute Nelson moved that Mr. Gilman be declared the nominee of the convention, and the motion was carried. Mr. Gilman was called for, and taking the stage said:

Gentlemen and Friends: I am constrained to believe that the rural districts have been heard from. The people who send delegates have not gone back on me, and the little Norwegian you heard of last fall hasn't gone back on me, either. (Applause.) I thank the people more than the politicians for the honor, though I thank the latter for what they have done. I have been too busy to prepare any speeches and it's late. I thank you for the honor you have conferred on me, and I am glad to have discovered that the office of lieutenant governor is the most important in the State. [Laughter and applause.] There have been asperities in this contest, but I thank my opponents for the complaisance with which they accept the result. Gentlemen, good night.

SECRETARY OF STATE.

The chair said the next office for which a nomination would be made would be secretary of state.

Col. Mark D. Flower moved that the nomination be made by acclamation. Maj. Gould moved to amend by proceeding to an informal ballot. The amendment did not prevail, and Mr. Von Baumbach was declared the nominee of the convention.

TO NAME THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

The chair announced as the committee to name the central committee the following;

Thomas Simpson, Winona; A. H. Truax, Dakota; I. C. Slade, Winona; W. Anderson, Hennepin; A. E. Barron, Rice; H. G. Page, Otter Tail; John Groetsch, Sibley; C. H. Conkey, Fillmore, C. F. Kindred, Crow Wing; John Swenson, Yellow Medicine; E. S. Warner, Blue Earth; Stanford Newell, Ramsey; M. E. Powell, Redwood.

THE TREASURERSHIP.

Senator O'Brien presented for the office of treasurer the name of Charles Kittelson of Freeborn county.

Mr. Taylor of Dodge presented the name of Capt. L. G. Nelson of Dodge county.

Mr. Barker presented the name of Henry Brodowick of Yellow Medicine.

Mr. Dewey of Pope county named A. E. Johnson of Ramsey county.

Capt. Mark D. Flower moved that the nomination of Mr. Kittelson be declared by acclamation, and Mr. Barker moved to amend to proceed to ballot.

Mr. Flower, at the request of Mr. Kittelson, withdrew his motion, and the ballot was proceeded with in the usual manner. The ballot, upon motion, was made a formal one, and resulted as follows:

Kittelson	130	Johnson	15
Nelson	41
H. Grunmald	4	Whole No. votes	246
Brodewick	36	Necessary to choice	121
N. McFadden	20

On motion Mr. Kittelson's nomination was made unanimous.

THE STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

The committee appointed to select a State central committee reported the following:

At Large—Gen. R. N. McLaren.
First District—A. K. Finseth.
Second District—Mark D. Flower.
Third District—Thomas Simpson.
Fourth District—E. S. Carser.
Fifth District—Robert Taylor.
Sixth District—Col. William Thomas.
Seventh District—J. G. Nelson.
Eighth District—D. L. How.
Ninth District—W. F. Dickinson.
Tenth District—C. H. Conkey.
Eleventh District—H. C. Kendall.
Twelfth District—John E. Arnott.

Col. George H. Johnston said that the committee was jug-handled, and moved to adopt the report, except as to the Twelfth district, but the motion did not prevail, and the report as a whole was adopted.

Mr. Childs later moved a reconsideration of the vote whereby the report was adopted, and, a division being called for, a motion was made to postpone the vote until the nominations had been made.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Mr. Nordeno of Kandiyohi county presented the name of W. J. Hahn for attorney general and Dr. B. H. Millard the name of Fayette Marsh, Stanford Newall seconding the latter nomination.

The first ballot which was made—an informal one—resulted as follows:

W. J. Hahn	169
Fayette Marsh	71
Whole number votes	240
Necessary to choice	121

The ballott was declared the formal one, and the nomination made unanimous.

RAILROAD COMMISSIONER.

Gen. J. H Baker was then nominated for railroad commissioner by acclamation.

An attempt was then made to overhaul the new state Central Committee as reported, lasting until after midnight without action.

The New Ulm Review gives an airing to the refined æsthetic taste to its county officials in the following incisive paragraph: "The court house square is beautifully bordered with a patch of potatoes. It is possible that our county has become so poor that it cannot pay its officials and support its poor without renting out the court house square for a vegetable garden."

Though flour has declined 50 cents a barrel during the past fortnight, more mills are running at Minneapolis than at any time for two months. The shipments for the week were 47,125 barrels, or less than 8,000 per day for the six business days, indicating a large increase in the amount of flour in store. The present wheat in store is 2 500,000 bushels. While this supply is sufficient to carry the mills well into August, it is propable that an early and general suspension will occur unless a decided improvement takes place in the market.

Adjutant General Hawley inspected Company K. of Stillwater recently, and he pronounces it a first-class company in every respect, and says that under the command of Capt. Merry, an old army officer, it bids fair to become the best in the state. The same evening Paul Vanderhoof of Omaha, commander-in-chief of the G. A. R. in the United States, addressed the Grand Army post of Stillwater.

At a dinner party given last week by Wayland Trask, at the Oxford club, of Brooklyn, N. Y., to Senator Sabin, Mr Trask presided, with the guest of the evening on his right and J. T. Baldwin on his left. The other guests were J. W. Wilson, L. H. Taylor, W. H. Speer, Alonzo Slote, O. Baldwin, S. H. Stern, and J. A. McMicken, L. C. D. D'Homerque and H. D. Hotchkins. In the center of the table was a handsome bouquet of Jacqueminot roses. The dinner was entirely formal in character, and there were no set speeches.

During the recent commencement exercises at Union college, Cadet Hamblin of Winona, Minn., took the four first prizes, including that for the best examination on the United States constitution.

Maj. Wasson's Punishment.

Army officers have at last received a wholesome lesson against the violation of the regulations as to gambling. The president has approved the finding of the court martial and the recommendation of the secretary of war that Maj. James R. Wasson, late paymaster in the United States army, be dismissed from the army, to be imprisoned eighteen months at hard labor in some prison yet to be selected, and to have the causes of his punishment published at length in the newspapers of Iowa, the state from which he was appointed.

A TALE OF TWO SEAS.

It was steamer day in San Francisco—a dull June morning, some seventeen years ago. The wharf was crowded with eastward bound Californians, who were embarking on the steamship. Precisely at noon the engine-bell struck, the ponderous wheels revolved, and as the echoes of the parting gun reverberated among the hills and over the placid waters of the bay, eight hundred souls commenced the homeward journey via Nicaragua.

Scarcely had the ship passed Meiggs wharf before the passengers observed with surprise that she had stopped, and simultaneously they were all ordered on deck, while half a dozen police officers made a thorough search of the ship, which occupied two hours. During this time the captain impatiently walked the bridge, and occasionally, in response to his bell, the engines made a few revolutions to keep the ship in position. At last the well-known face of Captain L——, the chief of the detective force, presented itself at the gangway, accompanied by his aids. With a wave of the hand, and an adieu to the captain, they entered their boat, and were pulled toward the shore. The wheels once more commenced their long task. Passing at full speed through the Golden Gate, the steamer reached the open sea, and as the sun dipped in the waters of the Pacific, the shores of Calafornia faded in the distance.

That evening, after inspection, at eight o'clock, the captain was seated in the purser's office, in friendly conversation, looking over the passenger list.

"By the way, purser," he said, "what occasioned the unusual pertinacity of our friend, Captain L——' in searching the ship this afternoon? I felt like bringing him to sea, and giving him all the time he wanted."

The purser made no reply, but took from his pocket a photograph, which he handed to the captain, who looked at it and said: "Well, what has this got to do with it?"

"You remember," replied the purser; "that murder in Virginia City a fortnight since? That is the portrait of the murderer. L—— said he had positive information that he would be on board here, and tried hard to find him. One of his men was an officer from Nevada, with a requisition, and, as a large reward is offered for the man, they were very anxious to get him, but failed. However, the detective left his picture, and requested me to tell you about it. We may see him on board during the down trip, and you may feel like using your magisterial authority in returning him to the police when we get back."

The captain looked carefully at the portrait, which was that of a young man, rather fast-looking, but without any peculiarity that would distinguish him in a crowd. "Well purser," said he, "look out for him, and let me know if you see him. He may be 'stowed away' somewhere. I think I shall know him should I set eyes on him." With this the captain returned the picture, bade the purser good-night, and went to the pilot-house.

The fogs and winds of the California coast had given place to the tropical warmth of the Mexican coast, when, one afternoon, as the captain was leisurely walking toward the dining saloon, his eye fell upon a face that startled him—the face of a man who, for an instant, withstood the searching glance without flinching, as the captain nonchalantly passed by, turned into the dining-saloon, then, quickening his pace, passed through and entered the purser's room, where he found that gentleman making his dinner toilet.

"You know that fellow of whom we were speaking, purser? Let me see his picture," said the captain. "Yes, that is the man. I have spotted him; his whiskers are cut off, and his hair is long, but that is the man. I know the cut of his jib."

The captain had indeed spotted his man, but what to do with him was the question. There were no papers on board authorizing his arrest, and if such authority was assumed while the task was easy, it might in the end prove a troublesome and thankless one. After full consideration, it was deemed best to take no notice of the fellow, and avoid the legal complications which might ensue if he were returned to San Francisco.

But three days after, as the ship was nearing the shores of Central America, an incident occurred which necessitated prompt action, and brought the murderer face to face with a power that could control him. One morning, about ten o'clock a steerage passenger knocked at the captain's door. He was a man in the prime of life, with the appearance of a miner, and was shaking with fright—too excited to talk coherently. When he had collected himself a little, he asked to speak a word in private to the captain.

"There is a very bad man in the steerage, captain," said he. "He murdered a man in Virginia City a fortnight before we left. I knew him there by sight, and seeing him on board, I told one or two about him, and other passengers got hold of it. He has found out that I exposed him, and he whispered in my ear a few minutes since that he would get even with me by cutting my d——d heart out. And he will do it, too, captain, if he gets a chance, either on board or after we have landed. Can't you do something to keep him quiet, captain? I think I will go back to San Francisco in the ship, as I know he will kill me when I get ashore at Nicaragua."

The man was trembling in every joint, evidently very much frightened, and said he was unarmed. The captain, in a calm way, explained to him that the certainty of immediate arrest and punishment would deter the desperado from carrying out his threat while on board; and if he had any such murderous intentions, he would no doubt wait until the transit across the isthmus. Meanwhile, he advised the panic-stricken passenger to arm himself, and to use his arms without hesitation should he find it necessary. The captain further assured him that he would take steps to insure his safety while on board, and, as far as possible, until the Atlantic steamer was reached. With this the threatened man went forward, partially reassured, and the captain sent for the purser.

"Purser," said he, in a quiet way, "I am about to invite the murderer to my room. You will please accompany a quartermaster to the steerage and hunt him up—he usually hangs around the starboard steerage gangway. Say to him that I wish to see him, and let the quartermaster and yourself return with him. Should he be fractious, do nothing but report at once. Have paper and pencil ready, and make notes of my conversation with him. We may need proof of what is said."

After the purser left, the captain opened a drawer, from which he took a pair of hand-cuffs, which he unlocked; two navy revolvers, the caps of which he closely examined, and put the tools under the edge of his mattress, within easy reach. He then sat down, and quietly awaited the return of his officers. In a few minutes the purser returned with the murderer, closely followed by the quartermaster, whom the captain directed to close the door and remain outside. Motioning the man to a seat, the captain said: "Good morning, sir. Of course you know me, and I presume you are convinced that I know you. Purser, please examine this man's ticket."

Without a word the man handed the purser his ticket.

The ticket is all right, captain, except the name," said the purser.

Pulling the photograph out of his pocket the captain said:

"Do you know that man? Why is his name not on the ticket?"

A gleam of surprise passed over the man's features, as he replied: "Captain, I see that you know me. What do you want of me? Have I not behaved myself on board your ship?"

"You have come to the point at once," replied the captain. "In threatening the life of another passenger you have rendered yourself amendable to ship discipline, and my purpose in calling you here is to tell you that you must let the townsman of yours alone. If you threaten him again, or attempt to molest him, I will put you in double irons and take you back to San Francisco. Besides this, I will see that you are a marked man on the transit. You will be pointed out to the sergeant of the guard in charge of the specie, and on the slightest attempt at a disturbance, you will be shot down in your tracks. Your fate is in your own hands; behave yourself, and you will not be disturbed."

"That's a pretty hard day for a man, captain," said the desperado.

"Well," replied the captain, "it is only hard in case you deserve it. Now go forward, mind you keep quiet—no more threats. I shall hear of them, and if harm befalls your townsman I shall hold you to account."

A few days later the Pacific voyage was ended, and the passengers commenced their trip across the transit, accompanied by a guard of twenty Nicaraguan soldiers, who were told to look out for the filibustero. Even at that late day a "filibuster" was particularly disliked in Nicaragua, the natives retaining a lively and anything but pleasing recollection of Walker. So our Virginia City passenger received an amount of personal attention which he did not at all relish. But he kept his peace and went his way undisturbed.

Three years had passed and the circumstance had nearly faded from the captain's memory. Meanwhile he had been assigned to duty on the Atlantic. One cloudy afternoon in December, while the steamship was doggedly fighting a strong head-wind and high head-sea in the Carribean, just off Morant Keys, an accident to the machinery forced her to call at Savannah, where she anchored off Tybee. Early next morning the captain left the ship with the purser, in the captain's gig, and went up the river to Savannah. At that time Savannah was under martial law. Sherman, with his victorious legions, had reached it on their way to the sea. The streets were patrolled by the provost-guard, and sentinels in blue stood at the corners. After telegraphing to New York, the captain and pursers were immediately occupied in buying coal and stores, as well as chartering a schooner to carry them to the ship at Tybee, for she drew too much water to reach the city. These arrangements being completed, and the work of loading the schooner started, the captain and purser went to the Pulaski house, and ordered dinner. While standing together in the hotel office, a rough looking character entered, and, walking close to the captain, said, in a surly voice: "Captain, I s'pose you don't know me?"

"Really, sir," replied the captain, "I do not. I presume you may have been a passenger with me at some time." The captain hardly wondered at his inability to recognize the man, for his eyes were bloodshot—one of them showed signs of a free-fight, his clothes were shabby, and his head covering was an old slouched hat.

"Well" said the seedy fellow, "you remember the man you were going to have shot in Nicaragua. I'm the man; and I want to tell you, captain, I've got you now. You won't leave this town; I'll cut your d——d heart out.

The captain stepped back a few feet, and quickly recovering his presence of mind, replied: "I'll try to be ready for you, sir."

With this, the desperado left the room, and the proprietor of the hotel said: "Why, captain, where have you met that man? He is one of the most desperate scoundrels in town, and will kill you on sight, if he can; for he means what he says. Are you armed?"

"No," replied the captain.

"Well you must not leave this house without being heeled." And, leaving the office, the landlord soon returned with a pair of navy revolvers and two bowie knives, which he handed to the captain and purser, saying: "Here are the tools; take them with you to the ship, and return them by the pilot. Look sharp when you turn corners, and don't run any unnecessary risks after dark. I will now report to the provost-guard what the scoundrel said to the captain, and have him watched. He don't want to get into their hands, for they are down on him, and he knows they will make short work of him, if he gives them a chance.

The captain and purser acted on this friendly advice. They turned corners with care, and when finally, at ten o'clock that night, they went on board the coal-laden schooner at the levee, they walked as if in an enemy's country. But they reached the ship in safety, and were soon on their way to New York, where the captain bade adieu to his passengers, and the incident at Savannah passed from his mind. It was suddenly recalled to his attention by reading the following extract from a Savannah paper:

A Bar-room Murder.—James M——, known to the police as "Fighting Jimmy," a troublesome character and well-known desperado, was shot by an unknown party in a bar-room fight two nights since at a saloon near the levee. Savannah can well spare him. No arrests have been made thus far.

The desperado had met his fate.—The Argonaut.

TWO NEGATIVES.

I gave him his first rejection,
At Newport a year ago;
At Christmas, with proper reflection,
Again, in New York, I said "No."

There's in grammar a rule I remember—
Two negatives—how does it run?

All Paid After Twenty Years.

From the Philadelphia Times.

Many retired merchants of the city and the heirs and legal representatives of many of the business men who have slept for years in Laurel Hill were agreeably surprised yesterday at the receipt of bank checks as payment of the remainder of the indebtedness of the wholesale dry goods firm of Hood, Bonbright & Co., caused by the failure of Hood & Co., in 1861. For twenty years a debt fund has been growing in the books of the firm unknown to any one but the partners themselves, and for twenty years has the business world forgotten that $87,000 had remained unpaid since the compromise of the failure for over a third of a million. Men retired from business and others died believing that when they received seventy-five per cent. of their claims against Hood, Bonbright & Co., in 1861 they had made a compromise for all time. Of the large list of the firm's creditors in 1861 a very few remain in active business to-day. Wednesday and yesterday the remaining indebtedness was paid in full, with accumulated interest of twenty years. The amount thus paid was over $100,000.

A Plucky Woman.

As a Philadelphia street car was moving up Ninth street, a lady on the sidewalk noticed that one of the horses was in great pain from a galled shoulder. She stopped the car, and calling the driver's attention to the sore spots asked him not to drive the unhappy beast any further. The man attempted to drive on, but the lady sprang in front of the horses and declared that she would be run over before the car should proceed. Of course a crowd gathered, and in its wake came a policeman, who endeavored to effect a compromise; but the lady refused to budge, and finally the officer ordered the driver to unharness the horse then and there. Having accomplished her original purpose, the humanitarian turned her attention to her own rights, and caused both driver and conductor to be arrested for attempting to push her from the track. As the party moved off toward the police station a crowd of 500 persons cheered vociferously.

A VETERAN BENEFACTOR.

His Past Life, Present Plans, and What He Has to Say Upon a Subject That Astonished Him.

New York Times.

Nearly forty years ago a young man, of unusual endowments, began to mould public opinion upon a subject of vital importance. Like all pioneers, his early efforts were unsuccessful, but his ability and the value of his work soon won public confidence, and to-day there is not a village or hamlet in the country that has not been influenced by Dr. Dio Lewis. When, therefore, it was learned yesterday that he contemplated the establishment of a large magazine in this city, the fact was deemed so important that a representative of this paper was commissioned to see him and ascertain the truth of the rumor.

Dr. Dio Lewis is a gentleman of sixty years and two hundred pounds, with snow-white hair and beard, but probably the most perfect picture of health and vigor in the metropolis. He is a living exponent of his teachings, and notwithstanding the amount of work he has already done, promises still greater activity for years to come. He received the interviewer most courteously, and in reply to a question said:

"It is true I have come to New York to establish a monthly magazine. I have come here for the same reason that I went to Boston 25 years ago. Then Boston was the best platform in the country from which to speak of education. New York has now become most hospitable to progressive thoughts, and especially so to movements on behalf of physical training.

"I have reason to know the great and abiding interest of the American people in this subject. They have come to realize that the future of our country pivots upon our physical vitality, and especially upon the vigor of our women. My new magazine will bear the title "Dio Lewis's Monthly," and be devoted to Sanitary and Social Science. I hope through its pages to inaugurate a new departure in hygiene."

"Have you not written several books on the subject?"

"Yes, nine volumes, and some of them like "Our Girls," published by the Harpers, have had an enormous circulation, but the best work of my life I shall give the world in the new magazine. Forty years of skirmishing ought to conclude with ten years of organized warfare."

"Doctor, what is the occasion of this new interest in health questions?"

"It has come through suffering, which seems the only road to self knowledge. The stomach, heart, kidneys or liver fall into trouble, happiness is gone, and then people give attention to their health."

"Which of these organs is most frequently the victim of our errors?" asked the reporter.

"Within the last few years diseases of the kidneys have greatly multiplied. When I was engaged in practice, thirty-five and forty years ago, serious disease of the kidneys was rare; but now distressingly frequent and fatal."

"To what do you attribute this great increase of kidney troubles?"

"To the use of stimulating drinks, adulterated food and irregular habits of life."

"Doctor, have you any confidence in the remedy of which we hear so much now-adays. 'Warner's Safe Cure?'"

"I believe in the ounce of prevention, rather than in a ton of cure."

"But have you noticed the remarkable testimonials of Warners's remedy?"

"I have, and confess that they have puzzled and astonished me. The commendations of proprietary medicines usually come from unknown persons residing in back counties. But I see in our most reputable newspapers the warmest praise of Warner's Safe Cure from College Professors, respectable physicians, and other persons of high intelligence and character. To thrust such testimony aside may be professional, but it is unmanly. No physician can forget that valuable additions to our Materia Medica have sprung from just such sources. I was so impressed with this cloud of witnesses that I purchased some bottles of Warner's Safe Cure at a neighboring drug store, and analyzed one of them to see if it contained anything poisonous. Then I took three of the prescribed doses at once, and found there was nothing injurious in it. I do not hesitate to say that if I found my kidneys in serious trouble, I should use this remedy, because of the hopelessness of all ordinary treatment, and because when a hundred intelligent and reputable persons unite in the statement that a certain remedy has cured them of a great malady, I choose to believe that they speak the truth.

"But as you may know, my great interest in live lies in prevention. For forty years I have labored in this field. One of the phases of my work in New England was the establishment of the Ladies' seminary at Lexington, Mass. My aim was to illustrate the possibilites in the physical training of girls during their school life. This institution became before I left it, the largest and most successful Seminary for young women owned and managed by one person, in our country. I sat down to dinner every day with a family of two hundred persons. The remarkable results of this muscle training among girls, were given in my paper published in the North American Review of December, 1882.

"Besides, I established the Normal Institute for Physical Training in Boston, and for ten years was its president and manager. Dr. Walter Channing, Dr. Thomas Hoskins, Professor Leonard, and others were among its teachers, and more than four hundred persons took its diploma and went out into all parts of the land to teach the new schools of gymnastics. And now the years left to me I propose to devote to the magazine which I have come here to establish. It will be the largest periodical ever devoted to this field of literature, and will present the hundred and one questions of hygiene with the simplicity of a child's talk. To this end all so-called learning will be subordinated. The magazine will be more or less illustrated, and will strive to reach a high place in the confidence and hearts of the people. In a few weeks, our first number will appear, and we shall fondly hope for it a hearty welcome."

The facts above narrated are indeed most important. It is gratifying to know that the life long experiences of a gentleman who stands without a peer in successfully demonstrating the principles of hygiene; whose heart has always been in sympathy with the afflicted, and whose brain has ever been active in planning for their relief, are to be given to the public through the pages of a magazine. And it is specially significant and proof positive of rare merit that a proprietary medicine, even with such high standing as Warner's Safe Cure is known to have, should be endorsed and recommended by a man so able, so reputable and of such national renown as Dr. Dio Lewis.

HOW ONE MAN GOT RICH.

The Career of the Late George Law, of New York.

From the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat.

George Law, the millionaire, died Friday night, at his residence in Fifth avenue, New York. George law was borne in the town of Jackson, Washington county, this state, October 25, 1806. His father, who was of Irish birth, purchased a farm of 100 acres in Jackson soon after the revolution. Upon the farm young Law worked until he was eighteen years of age. During the winter he had an opportunity to attend the village school, where he learned to write and to cipher as far as the rule of three. With the exception of reading a few standard works on history, which he was able to procure in the neighborhood, this brief schooling was all he had.

When he was fifteen years of age young Law went to Troy on an errand for his father. This visit was his first glimpse of the great world, and it determined his future. He decided to leave the farm as soon as he had earned a little money. At the age of eighteen he had accumulated $49, and decided to seek his fortune. his father consented, and he walked to Troy. He engaged cheap lodgings and looked for work for a number of days without success. When he was passing along River street one day he saw a hod carrier fall and break his leg. Young Law immediately offered to take his place. The foreman finding he had no experience, told him he would probably break his neck. Law said he would take the risk, and he carried until the building was finished. He continued to work as a hod carrier until a boss mason offered to teach him the trade of bricklaying.

After learning his trade he worked steadily, saving as much as possible of the earnings, and becoming an expert mason. In the opening of 1825 he engaged as a mason in building an Erie canal lock, receiving $2.25 a day. He worked in this way for seven years. He then thought he had money enough to give up working as a day laborer. He secured the post of superintendent in constructing a lock on the Lehigh Canal near Easton, Pa. As soon as the work was finished he determined to become a contractor, and he did, securing the contract to build a lock and aqueduct. From this time forward he continued to secure lucrative contracts.

When he was twenty-seven years of age he married Miss Anderson, of Philadelphia, who was a great aid to him in the labor of winning a fortune. In 1834 he had accumulated $23,000. He then took a vacation, and went to Chicago, which was then a center of interest, but returned to Washington county, and paid for 500 acres of land his father had bought. After several lucrative contracts in Pennsylvania, he secured several heavy contracts on the Croton aqueduct for the New York water supply. He built the high bridge over the Harlem river. Before entering upon the work he examined some of the finest structures of the kind in the old world, so that he finally accomplished a work which will be a lasting monument to his skill. This work was completed in 1849. He was then worth millions, and embarked in various enterprises, which brought more wealth continually. He became the owner of railroads, steamships and ferries.

He never swerved from his labor of getting money. except in 1756, when he was mentioned as a Know Nothing candidate for president. This pleased him for a time, but he eschewed politics ever after. For the last twelve years he has lived in retirement. Thurlow Weed speaking of Law, Vanderbilt, and Dean Richmond, said no one of them could have passed a competive examination for a mail carrier, or even a nightwatchman at the Custom house. Mr. Weed had received letters from all, and they spelled hardly a single word of three syllables correctly. George Law leaves an enormous estate to his wife, two sons, and three daughters. He has showed what can be accomplished by will and tact in the race for wealth.

A Pretty Girl of 17 Caught While Dressed in Male Attire.

From the Chicago News.

A girl was caught yesterday at the Wells street bridge masquerading in male attire. Frank Chambers was the name she gave at the Chicago avenue station, and the desk sergeant made no comment when he put it down on the docket, so like a boy she seemed. A handsome boy, too, with black hair and eyes, regular features, and a clear complexion that many women would envy. She was a trifle short for a man, but there are many men shorter, and her figure was compact and good. She was 17 years old. Her story is that she has worn men's clothes for three years, and all that time she has served upon lake vessels in various capacities. Her sex has been frequently discovered, but she never met with any trouble on account of it before. She claims that she took to a male mode of life because only that way could she earn an honest living, and the careless abandon with which she borrowed a chew of tobacco from the lock-up keeper showed a thorough acquaintance with male habits. She is far more than ordinarily good-looking. Her right name she refused to give, and all she will say of her antecedents is that her mother is dead.

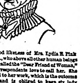
A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

[From the Boston Globe.]



Messrs. Editors:—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure entirely the worst form of falling of the uterus, Leucorrhœa, irregular and painful Menstruation, all Ovarian Troubles, Inflammation and Ulceration, Floodings, all Displacements and the consequent spinal weakness, and is especially adapted to the Change of Life."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as abundant testimonials show.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity.

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

A Bear in a Bar-room.

While Watts's managerie was being transferred from the railroad station to Oakland Garden yesterday morning, one of the bears managed to unfasten the door of his cage, and, effecting an escape on Ruggles Street, tumbled out of the wagon in which he was being drawn, and lumbered into a neighboring saloon. Several patrons of the establishment made a wild break for the back door on seeing the beast enter, thinking possibly they had "got 'em again," but the bear paid no attention to them, and made straight for the bar. The barkeeper, whose back was turned at the time, faced around on hearing the noise, when he saw the animal standing on his hind legs, his fore paws resting on the edge of the bar, his head bobbing up and down, and his mouth wide open, displaying a remarkably fine fine set of white and glistening teeth. The dispenser of the ardent doubtless had served many hard customers in his time, but never one like this; and he dashed through an open window to the sidewalk, shouting, as he alighted, "You can have him! I don't want him!" For some little time nobody dared enter the place, though the bear stuck to his position, "mopoing and moving," and executing a sort of solemn dance on his hind lets,. Finally the keeper of the animals came back, and tried to get the beast out; but his efforts were in vain. Ursa Major refused alike entreaties and commands. Then a happy thought occurred to several persons at once, and they shouted in unison, "He wants a drink!" The keeper immediately seized upon the idea and put it in practice. Pouring out a bountiful libation of beer, he offered it to the bear which lapped it up greedily, and then, his thirst being assuaged, the big animal suffered himself to be quietly led back to the wagon and its cage.—Boston Herald,

TUTT'S
EXPECTORANT

Is composed of Herbal and Mucilaginous products, which permeate the substance of the Lungs, expectorates the acrid matter that collects in the Bronchial Tubes, and forms a soothing coating, which relieves the irritation that causes the cough. It cleanses the lungs of all impurities, strengthens them when enfeebled by disease, invigorates the circulation of the blood, and braces the nervous system. Slight colds often end in consumption. It is dangerous to neglect them. Apply the remedy promptly. A test of twenty years warrants the assertion that no remedy has ever been found that is as prompt in its effects as TUTT'S EXPECTORANT. A single dose raises the phlegm, subdues inflammation, and its use speedily cures the most obstinate cough. A pleasant cordial, children take it readily. For Croup it is invaluable and should be in every family.

PRIDE.

Hark the rustle of a dress
Stiff with lavish costliness!
Here comes one whose cheek would flush
But to have her garments brush
'Gainst the girl whose fingers thin
Wove the weary 'broidery in,
Bending backward from her toil
Lest her tears the silk might soil,
And in midnight's chill and murk
Stitched her life into the work!
Little doth the wearer heed
Of the heart-break in the brede;
A hyena by her side
Skulks, down-looking,—it is Pride.

JAMES R. LOWELL.

DOCTOR FRANK.

"Dear me! Such a pretty dress so sadly wasted. It seems almost a sin to put it on. I don't think either Uncle Reuben or Aunt Jane will appreciate it, and Fido I am sure will not, inasmuch as its ruffles are not to be soiled by his dirty paws."

And, thus soliloquizing, Kate Arden hesitated a moment as to whether the open trunk should receive back the pink batiste, with its innumerable lace-edged flounces and loops of rose colored ribbon, or whether it should deck the pretty face and form reflected in the mirror of Aunt Jane's best bedroom, occupied only since yesterday by her pretty city niece, who had come down to smell the June roses and woo some of their color into her own pale cheeks.

Something in the reflection decided the question. The trunk was closed, the bastite donned; and, looking as lovely as the first flush of sunrise, Kate tripped smilingly down the stairs, knowing that two pair of eyes would kindle into admiration, and that Uncle Reuben would break into a hearty speech.

Nor was she mistaken. He turned toward her as she opened the door.

"Ah here comes the little girl now!" he said. "Kate, dear—why how lovely you're looking, my lassie!—this is our new doctor—Doctor Lawerence! He stopped in to know how my rheumatism was getting on, and I was just talking to him about you."

The girl looked up. All regret concerning the pink batiste fled, for standing by her uncle's side was a young, handsome man, whose clear brown eyes were bent full upon her, and who acknowledged the introduction with a courteous bow, utterly devoid of embarrassment or rusticity.

"We thought at first no one could take poor old doctor Gray's place," continued Uncle Reuben. ("You knew he was dead Kate? Yes, took a sudden cold last winter.) But somehow I don't think we'd quite know how to do without Doctor Lawrence now, although we old folks do laugh at some of his new-fledged notions."

"You're very kind, Mr. Evans," answered the young man, in a deep, musical voice. "I hope you don't think me unappreciative of how little you've let me feel myself a stranger in Evansville."

"It was your own magic my boy; but talking of strangers, you must certainly not be so now. We don't quite know what to do with this city girl, who's come to spend a few weeks with us, to get back the roses dissipation and town life have scattered. You'll have to help us make the country so attractive that she'll not be in too great a hurry to run away from us."

"If you always set such delightful tasks, Mr. Evans, your prescriptions will, I am quite sure, be religiously followed, though, unfortunately, every chemist cannot make them up."

And he glanced at Kate with a mischievous smile.

She was not slow with some merry repartee, and when, half an hour later, Dr. Lawrence took his departure, he had left quite a pleasurable little wave of anticipation and excitement behind. Nor did Kate experience any more regret at pretty dresses being wasted, as one by one she took them from her trunks, and proceeded to make herself as fascinatingly pretty as possible.

It was wonderful, too the time that Doctor Lawerence managed to spare from his patients. It grew to be a very customary thing for his light wagon to drive up in the early gloaming, and for Kate to take in it her place beside him, for one of those charming drives she said were doing her so much good. They had long talks, too—talks in which he told her his hopes for the future, and touched very lightly on some of his disappointments and struggles of the past.

She learned that this man was ambitious; that the post of a physician in this obscure town was in his own mind a stepping-stone across the stream which yet separated him from honor, name and fame. Somehow her own blood coursed more quickly, and her pulses leaped as she listened. It was all so different from the languid talk she was used to hearing from the men who would spend, in roses they offered at her shrine, a sum which would do so much to realize his life ambition; yet she wrote home:

"I am having a new experience—a flirtation with a country physician. I hope he's taking care of his heart; he may find it difficult to heal himself. For me, of course, I have no heart. He has so much spare energy, I'm sure he must find it a kindness to be able to expand some of it even on me."

But after she had written this she laid down her pen and sighed. After all the words did not help her in a fight she was having with herself, nor make her arguments the stronger for her own convincing; but she folded and sealed the letter and mailed it the same evening, she and the doctor driving past the post office that she might do so. Was she sorry for what she knew was inevitable?

June had nearly passed before Frank Lawrence put his fate into her hands. She had had many men make love to her, but never one in those simple, earnest tones:

"You'll have to share some of the hardships, Kate," he said; 'but I'll make it as light as may be for you, darling; and one day I'll make you proud of me. Looking ahead to the light, will you let my love make the present not quite dark?'

He used no eloquence, no passion, but his face was very pale, and his hand trembled just a little as he folded hers within it and awaited her reply.

A sharp pain she could not then analyze shot through her heart.

"I am very sorry, Doctor Lawrence," she murmured, "but it is impossible."

"Impossible! Why?"

"I—I—"

She got no further.

"You do not love me? Is that what you would say? Look straight in my eyes and tell me true!"

She dared not. He knew that once her eyes met his she would hide her head upon his breast and whisper what she dared not acknowledge—that he alone had not been burned in the hot fire her hands had helped to kindle.

For one little minute the memory of the past month returned to her—the strange, sweet influence he had exerted over her life—the future sweetness life might yet hold for her.

Pshaw! This was but a girl's idle sentiment. Did not every man dream of glory? And to grow old, like Aunt Kate and Uncle Reuben, in a stagnant country town—to have her sleep disturbed by every old man and woman within a radius of twenty miles who wanted a potion for their latest ailment—how could she bear this?

"I am already engaged to be married," she answered, hastily, as though seeking strength in the words, a vision rising before her as she uttered them of the man of her choice—a man more than twice her age, bald and gouty, but with bonds and bank-notes sufficient to atone for all deficiencies, and make the world esteem it high honor that she should be made his wife.

"Oh, Frank, forgive me!" she cried in quick contrition—for his hand had now unclasped itself from hers, and he sprang to his feet with a look upon his face of mortal agony.

But he answered her not a word, as he walked away in the mockery of the June sunlight.

* * * * * *

Five years later, and in one of the fashionable hotels of Paris lay a child ill unto death—a little fairy creature, of perhaps three years of age, but whose golden curls now clusterad about a face white as the lace-trimmed pillows on which it rested.

Over her bent her mother a woman young and beautiful—a widow, wondrous rich, the world said, but who, in this hour would gladly have poured out her treasures to buy the priceless treasure of her darling's life. She had not loved her husband, this same world declared; but, be this, as it may, he had made no moan into its listening ear, and after two short years of wedded life, when death, after a short, decisive struggle, had claimed him, all that he had was willed unreservedly to the woman who had filled alike his pride and his heart.

If she had also made the latter suffer, there was no codicil in his last generous testament to that effect.

A light knock on the door aroused her. She softly opened it.

"The young American physician to whom madam was recommended is below," announced an attendant.

"Show him up," she answered, and returned to her post. "Come in," she called, softly, when a second knock was heard; and then, standing motionless, she turned to look into the face of one who, though a stranger, was at least a countryman, but started back as though confronted by a ghost. "Frank!" she murmured; "is it you?"

His own amazement equalled hers.

"Ah, I comprehend!" he said, the first to regain his self-control. 'I did not recognize Miss Arden in Mrs. Geoffery, and doubtless the French tongue so garbled my own name as to render your mistake an easy one. Pardon me I will withdraw at once."

"No, no, stay!" she cried, laying one entreating hand upon his arm. "I have heard of your wonderful skill, which has made your name famous even on this side of the water. Oh, Frank, be merciful! Save my child—my baby! She is all, all that I have."

"Where is your husband?"

In quick, curt tones he put the question.

"Did you not know?" she said. "He has been dead three years."

"And your child—— Yes, I have heard. It is the brain which is affected."

"She has been unconscious for twenty-four hours. The physicians here have given her up. Oh, Frank, do not tell me she must die, if you would not break my heart," and she clasped her hands together in an agony of entreaty.

A scornful, incredulous smile crept about his lips—this woman spoke as if she had a heart; but his physician's instinct conquered hesitation, and bending over the little sufferer, with careful, tender skill he lifted the clustering rings from the baby brow, and made a brief examination of the head. He looked very grave as he lifted his own.

"There is but one chance for your child's life, Mrs. Geoffrey," he said then, and only the physician spoke. "There must be an immediate operation of a most precarious nature. Her recovery from it is extremely doubtful; but there is a chance. Otherwise there is none. Will you consent?"

"You will perform it?"

"I will intrust it to no one else."

"She is in your hands. Do with her as you will."

"And if she dies?"

"Oh, Frank she is my child! You will not let her die."

Was it the remembrance of these words which made Dr. Lawrence hesitate, a few hours later, as, with two of the most eminent surgeons in Paris, he stood beside the little sufferer? If his judgment should be at fault? But there was no time to weigh the question.

Two hours after he stepped into the darkened room, where one woman awaited him.

"She is sleeping. When she wakes she will know you. I think she will live."

He had stopped some little distance from her as he spoke, but with a suddenness he could not divine she had fallen on her knees before him, grasping his hands, and covering them with kisses and her tears.

"You must be calm for your child's sake," he said, in a voice all unmoved. "Now go to her. I will return to watch with you through the night."

But when morning dawned his prophecy had been fulfilled. Death had taken away his grim shadow, and the baby, waking, smiled into the beautiful face above her and whispered:

"Mamma!"

Throughout Paris spread the news of the marvellous operation. It was another on the long list of triumphs accomplished by this young man, who had not yet attained his thirty-fifth year— "Doctor Frank," baby Alice called him; and as the old gulf grew and widened between Mrs. Geoffrey and himself, they became the greater friends.

Three weeks had elapsed, when he said, one day:

"Little Alice is quite well now. My visits will be no longer necessary."

"I can never repay my debt, Dr. Lawrence," answered Alice's mother. "But here is my cheque. Fill it with what sum you will. It shall be honored."

"Madam," he said, "it is I who am in your debt."

And with a quick motion he tore in two the piece of paper she had handed him.

"See! you make mamma cry said the baby. She always cries after you have been here. Why does she do that, Doctor Frank? Kiss her—Please kiss her—and tell her you are sorry. You must not make my pretty mamma cry."

"Good-by, little one!" he answered, casting no glance to the lovely face, pale with its long anxious waiting.

"You havn't kissed mamma," pleaded the baby voice. 'She says she was very naughty to you once. Please forgive her, and do not let her cry any more."

He strode toward Kate at these latter words.

"Is it true," he asked, "that you fancy you stand in need of my forgiveness? When I cease to love you, I will send it to you."

"Frank," she whispered, "must you wait till then? God knows I have suffered from my fault. I was only a child, Frank. I did not know my own heart, or that I had one, until—until——"

"Until what?"

His voice was very hoarse now, and he drew a step nearer her.

"Must you wring all from me?" she said. "Yet I owe you the atonement. Until I learned your image filled it. Scorn, despise me you will, I cannot banish it."

But ere she could finish her confession Doctor Frank had caught her in his arms, baby Alice clapping her hands exultantly—the little hands which had unwittingly bridged the chasm between two divided hearts.

THE CRAZY FITS OF ELEPHANTS.

A Showman's Recollections of Keepers Killed and Destruction Done by Them.

"Of all mad elephants, Hannibal, I think, was the worst," said Dr. I. A. Graves, the veteran showman as Bunnell's. "Most elephants recover from a mad fit within a few days, but Hannibal—well, he would keep up a tantrum for weeks and months at a time. The longest spell he ever had began early one morning in June, 1854, while travelling with Raymond & Waring's menagerie from Pawtucket to Fall River. He broke away from his keeper and ran the highway thirteen miles, smashing everything he could. Talk about elephants being large! Hannibal looked as big as a locomotive that morning. The keeper attempted to check him, and was chased into a swamp. The first vehicle the mad elephant met was a butcher's cart loaded with mutton. He smashed the cart, killed the horse, broke the driver's arm, and scattered the quarters of mutton along the highways. Two vegetable wagons were upset and the horses were killed, the drivers escaping unhurt. When the fury of his fit was spent, Hannibal was found beneath a tree on the road side completely exhausted, and for the time submissive. Tusk chains were applied, and for many weeks afterward he was kept under the strictest surveillance. To approach him during this period was dangerous. On turning out one morning in Burlington, Vt., I found a number of women and children petting him, while he was swinging his ears in evident enjoyment. Then I knew the spell was broken. He was very docile and tractable the rest of that season.

"Hannibal was the most vicious elephant that ever tramped with a show. In 1849, while we were at Connellsville, Ohio, a stranger gave him a pail of water. He drank the water leisurely, and then, suddenly turning his head, struck the man with his tusks. The poor fellow died. While chained at Williamsburg, N. H., in 1857, he took a fit and pursued the keeper into a stoneyard, when he got wedged in among the boulders, and was subdued in that dilemma. Up to 1845 Hannibal was noted for his unchangeable good nature. In those days old "Put" Townsend used to be his keeper. 'Put' had trained him to drive the stake to which it was customary to chain him. One day 'Put' started the stake and handed the sledge to Hannibal to complete the job. Hannibal made a ponderous blow at the stake head, but struck his foot instead. He threw the sledge so far that it required an hour's search to find it, and never would touch one again. Hannibal lived to be 100 years old, and killed twelve men.

Columbus was another bad elephant. In December, 1849, while at Raymond & Waring's menagerie, Chestnut street Philadelphia, he killed his keeper, took possession of the show, and retained it for three days, killing in that time two camels, a llama, and upsetting a large stove and two animal cages. The doors were barricaded, cannon were mounted in the street, and soldiers paraded on the premises in readiness to give him a warm reception should he appear. Finally two keepers entered the building from above, straddled the cross-beams, and dropped a noose rope to the floor. He walked into the trap, and when he realized that he was caught, submitted quietly to the chaining operation. Columbus fell through a bridge at North Adams, Mass., the following summer, and died a few days later.

"Bill Williams, or "Canada Bill," as he was professionally called, was Columbus's first keeper. Forepaugh's elephant Romeo killed him in winter quarters at Frankfort, Pa., in 1865. Bill went into the elephant's den to do some chores and his crushed and mangled body was found in a few hours afterward. Geo. Waste was killed in much the same manner by Turner's African Romeo. Before a rescuing party could get his body away from the elephant it was denuded of everything except one boot. The elephant Pizzaro had mad spells oftener than those I have mentioned. In 1850 he killed his keeper and two camels near New Orleans, and then raided the country for miles around, doing a great deal of damage to farm property. Chief, who is the only one of the mad or 'rogue' elephants alive, killed John King, the keeper with Robinson's show, in 1879."

"What causes the madness of elephants?' was asked.

"If you have ever noticed, you may have seen that there are issues from the head of the elephant, just behind the ear. When these are kept open, a thin, watery substance exudes therefrom. I have always remarked that elephants are kindly disposed and easily handled while these issues are open, but just so soon as they become clogged madness ensues. The insertion of a common tape needle brings relief."

"Is it true that elephants are fond of stimulants and narcotics?"

"Yes, exceedingly so. Now, there's a popular error that should be corrected. It has always been thought that if you gave an elephant tobacco he would never forget it, and years afterward would kill you did an opportunity present itself. That is not so. On the contrary, there are but two things which they relish more appletree boughs and thistles. Their passion for fine cut tobacco is something marvelous. Some years ago, when I was traveling with the elephant Conqueror, it was my custom to carry a meerschaum pipe in a particular pocket in my coat. One day I left my coat within reach of his trunk, and in less time than it takes me to tell it, he had found the pipe, crushed it, and swallowed it, case, stem, and all. During the few years I was with Conqueror I reckon he must have eaten several hundred pounds of tobacco. The truth of the matter is, gentlemen, an elephant, like an intelligent person, will eat only what suits his taste, and never harbors any dislike for those people who give him disagreeable food."

The Footlight Queen's Boudoir.

The New York Morning Journal thinks that Sara Jewett doesn't believe in crimping her hair. She has very nice hair of her own, of a soft, wavy texture, and she has been told that any extra manipulation with hot irons would make her bald at forty-five. Kate Claxton has the finest hair in the theatrical profession, and it is her special pride. The color is a dark, rich auburn, and it falls below her waist. If Kate Claxton gives way to any particular vanity it is her hair, at which she will sometimes spend two hours before the glass of a morning, brushing, combing and plaiting those luxurient tresses.

Rosa McAllister is a rather pretty young woman of twenty-seven or so, who, in preference to occupying any secondary position in a large city, prefers to be a star at the west. Recently she has been touring in Dakota. During the trip she was joined by one of the partners of a large house in Duluth, and out of this a local editor made a sort of Langtry-Gebhart episode. But the merchant in question was a different sort of man. He straightway came back and had a battle royal with the editor. It seems the lover militant had advanced some money to Miss McAllister to carry on her company, and went on simply to see about his business affairs. Now the two have become engaged, and the wicked editor is covered with confusion. Rose Coghlan is now on her way to California, and nothing does she regret more than being obliged to leave her pretty flat on Fiftieth street, which, from the parlor in the front to the kitchen in the back, is a marvel of taste and pschutt. Coghlan is very methodical. Three years ago she made a horse and brougham by her benefit. She puts so much of her salary of $225 away for that every week, so much for rent, so much for dress, so much for living, and the rest goes straight into bank. By no possibility does she overstep any of these separate expenditures. She hates traveling because she says it is stuffy. She can conceive nothing worse than a Pullman car; the meals are as a rule very bad and it disarranges all her habits. Rose is getting a bit old maidish.

One of our hospitals (let us hope it will be the eternal Hahnemann) is trying to get up a diamond exhibition for some time next winter, and all those who own fine parures are to be asked to lend their gems to the cause of charity. Mme. Patti and Mme. Janauschek are expected to aid the enterprise by lending their precious carbonata. No private lady, I believe, has any parure to equal either of these.

HOW TO GET ON AT COURT.

The Oddities of Etiquette at Madrid, and St. Petersburg.

An old custom of the Spanish court requires that when a baby is born in the royal family it shall be officially announced that a "vigorous" infant has come into the world. The Queen of Spain having become the mother of a sickly child, which lived only two hours the court journal chronicled the birth and death in the usual way: "Her Majesty was delivered at three o'clock of a vigorous infant, who died at five." The Epoca of Madrid lately reported that the Town Council of Seville, having had an interview with Alfonso XII, kissed the feet of his majesty and withdrew." It is not to be supposed that the councilors actually went down on all fours and of the Escurial, but sought to introduce simple manners in a country where even beggars drape themselves proudly in their tattered mantles and address one another as "Senor Cabellero." He one day told a muleteer, with whom he had stopped to talk on a country road under a broiling sun, to put on his hat; forgetting that by the fact of ordering a subject to cover himself in a royal presence he created him a grandee. Marshall Prim, who was standling by, hastily knocked the muleteer's head-dress out of his hand and set his foot upon it, at the same time offering the man some gold; but the muleteer, who was mortally offended, spurned the money and a few days later, when Prim was assassinatd, a rumor was circulated that the mortified individual who had narrowly missed becoming a grandee was an accessory to the crime. On another occasion King Amadeo inconsiderately addressed a groom of his in the second person singular as tu. Happily the man was an Italian for, as a court chamberlain presented to his Majesty; a Spaniard spoken to with his familiarity might have claimed that the monarch had dubbed him cousin—that is, had ennobled him. Another thing that the much worried Italian Prince had to learn was that a Spanish King must not sign any letter to a subject with any friendly or complimentary formula, but must simply write Yo el Rey ("I the King.")

Etiquette is the code of rules by which great people keep lesser ones in proper respect. Prince Bismarck, when a boy, was rebuked by his father for speaking of the king as "Fritz." "Learn to speak reverently of his majesty," said the old squire of Varzin, "and you will grow accustomed to think of him with veneration." Young Bismarck laid the advice to heart, and to this day the great chancellor always lowers his tone and assumes a grave worshipful look when he alludes to the kaiser. If a message is brought to him from the emperor by word of month or in writing, he stands up to receive it. When a wedding takes place at the Russian court, it is the practice of the state dignitaries to form a candle procession—that is to say that ministers, chamberlains, high stewards, take each a silver candlestick with a lighted taper in their hands, and conduct the bride and bridegroom round the ballroom, where guests are assembled, and thence into the throne room, where the pair do homage to the sovereign. At the first royal wedding which occurred after the Chancellor had been promoted to the dignity of Prince and Highness, Bismarck failed to appear in the candle procession, and Court gossips quickly concluded that he now thought himself too great a man to take part in the ceremenial ceremony. The truth was, however, that the Chancellor had been seized with a sudden attack of gout; and at the next wedding he was careful to silence all crapers by carrying his candle bravely like other Ministers.

Prince Gortchakoff was always equally careful to observe the minutest points of etiquette in relation to the late czar and the Imperial family. Lord Dufferin, asking him whether the Emperor's cold was better, was rather startled to hear him answer in a reverent voice, with his head bent and his eyes half closed, "His Majesty is deigned to feel a little better this morning." The Duke de Morny said of Gortachakoff, that he seemed to purr when he talked of any creature at court, "even of the Grand Duchess Olga's monkey." But possibly this imperturable obseqniousness is appreciated by the rulers of this earth, for Gortchakoff remained Prime Minister throughout the whole of the Emperor's reign.—Chambers' Journal.

How He Made the Dust Fly Between Chicago and Mendota.

From the Chicago Herald.

"Yes," said Mr. Dooflicker, as he drew his chair out on the porch to the family circle, "I had some wild experiences when I was a locomotive engineer. I remember one night I was ordered to take a doctor from Chicago to Mendota in the quickest possible time. To make my engine lighter I uncoupled the tender and left it on the side track. When the doctor took a seat on the fireman's box I threw the lever down in the corner and gave her steam. Away we jumped like a scared kangaroo. The doctor's eyes bulged out like a pair of porcelain drawer knobs as we hustled over the prairie toward Riverside. Ripity click we smashed along over the switches and frogs and bridge at Riverside, and the doctor hanging on for his life and looking like an uninsured man sitting down to his first dish of cucumbers.

"What's that—a post?" asked the doctor as we passed something in a jiffy.

"It was a coal shed 120 feet long. So you can see how fast we were going.

"What's that funny looking fringe on our left?" asked the doctor.

"Them's the telegraph poles," answered the fireman as he stopped half a minute from shoveling coal, just as we zipped through the shop yards at Aurora.

"Well, we made Mendota, without a stop, in forty-one minutes and a half, just two miles to the minute; and I boiled the coffee in my dinner-pail on the driving boxes."

Mrs. Dooflicker heaved a sigh of relief and said' "Well. I'm glad you got there safe. I expected, much as could be, you would tell us that the engine jumped off the track and all three of you were killed."

"No, we were all alive and safe" added Dooflicker, confidently.

"What a long-armed fireman you must have had, pa," put in young, Theopholus Dooflicker, as he looked up from the copy of Æsop's fables that lay on his lap.

"How's that?" asked Dooflicker.

"Why, to shovel coal in Aurora from a tender that stood on a side track in Chicago."

Dooflicker went in the house to get his pipe.

FARMERS' COLUMN.

The Short Rows.

The pair of black horses presented to Mrs. Gov. Austin Blair of Michigan in 1862, by the officers of the Twentieth Michigan infantry, which regiment rendezvoused at Jackson previous to going south, are still alive and driven daily by Mrs. Blair or other members of the governor's family. They are twenty-five years old.

A pear orchard, in Thomas county, Georgia, was sold five years ago for $650. It was next sold for $1,800, the $640 having been recouped from cuttings in the meantime. A month afterward $18,000 was offered for it and now it could not be bought for $25,000.

To show that the cornstalks, of which such enormous quantities are wasted in the west, can be utilized, some of the material was crushed and fed by Professor Sanborn in comparison with hay, a moderate quantity of grain being added in both cases. The stocks were well eaten and gave results indicating a value for fodder about three-fourths as great as that of good timothy.

One of the largest sales of lands ever made was reported the other day from Chicago where the purchase of 1,100,000 acres of the 4,000,000 acres of cotton land in Mississippi lying along the river, together with 400,000 acres of the pine lands in the southern end of the state, was consummated by the banking house of Dreyer & Co., on behalf of a foreign syndicate. The price per acre was $1.25, the total consideration being $1,975,000. This immense purchase is said to be the first of four such tracts soon to pass into European hands.

The chief advantage of the clover crop is the enrichment of the soil and the improvement of the texture. The enrichment is in proportion to the amount of root growth and foliage produced and shed on the soil, as well as the degree shading of land and retention of that degree of moisture favoring production of nitrogen. If it be grazed down so close as not to furnish any shading of the soil or retention of moisture, there is a loss on the side of fertilization. If, too, the ground be tramped when wet, and afterwards bakes and cracks in the summer's heat, the condition of growth is poor, indeed, compared with that of a soil shaded by a luxuriant clover growth, and unpacked by early and untimely tramping.—Breeder's Gazette.

Woman's Work for Woman.

On the subject of woman's work for woman Mrs. Florence M. Adkinson, of Indianapolis, writes: "Woman's work for woman is in this day almost a marvel. Every city and nearly every town has some organization of women with the advancement of womankind for its central thought and purpose. Some of these associations provide food, nursing and homes for hungry, sick, or friendless women, Others furnish work, open opportunities and a market for labor. Others extend advantages for training, education and culture. With all these organized helps, under various names, it would seem as though no woman need suffer privation or despair, or fall in upward struggle. Our girls have a far better chance than had their mothers. Old barriers are swept away, new fields and magnificent opportunities are before them. Womanly sympathy, womanly encouragement and womanly help sustain them on every hand. Under these circumstances, the girl who fails to acquire self-reliance, self-support and a fair degree of success is sadly lacking in inward strength. It is she, not world, that is out of joint."

A Popular Bathing Costume.

From the New York World.

For bathing the popular costume will be a combination dress of flannel serge. These are cut with trousers and corsage in one, with an overskirt to fasten on with a belt. They were introduced last year and proved so desirable that the older style of trousers separate and the blouse and skirt in one has fallen into disfavor.

Dark blue is the popular color, for it best stands contact with the salt water, and when tastefully trimmed is becoming to most bathers. Bunting lined with silesia is also employed to some extent for bathing dresses.

Cotton stockings, of heavy texture are the best sort for bathers. These may match the dress or its trimmings in color, or they may be of some contrasting hue. Plain colors, only, however, ought to be worn. Striped or figured hosiery is too conspicuous. Plain dark colors are far more becoming. Thick linen shoes are the most comfortable kind and the ones usually selected.

Should the Hair be Periodically Cut?

It may be that cutting and shaving may for the time increase the action of the growth, but it has no permanent effect either upon the hair bulb or the hair sac, and will not in any way add to the life of the hair. On the contrary, cutting and shaving will cause the hair to grow longer for the time being, but in the end will inevitably shorten its term of life by exhausting the nutritive action of the hair-forming apparatus. When the hairs are frequently cut, they will usually become coarser, often losing the beautiful gloss of the fine and delicate hairs. The pigment will likewise change—brown, for instance, becoming chestnut, and black changing to a dark brown. In addition, the ends of very many will be split and ragged, presenting a brush-like appearance. If the hairs appear stunted in their growth upon portions of the scalp or beard, or gray hairs crop up and there, the method of clipping off the ends of the short hairs, of plucking out the ragged, withered and gray hairs, will allow them to grow stronger and thicker. Mothers, in rearing their children, should not cut their hair at certain periods of the year (during the superstitious period of full moon), in order to increase its length and luxuriance as they bloom into womanhood and manhood. This habit of cutting the hair of children brings evil in place of good, and is also condemned by the distinguished worker in this department, Professor Kaposi of Vienna, who states that it is well known that the hair of women who possess luxurient locks from the time of girlhood never again attains its original length after having once been cut. Pincus has made the same observation by frequent experiment, and he adds that there is a general opinion that frequent cutting of the hair increases its length; but the effect is different from that generally supposed. Thus, upon one occasion, he states that he cut off circles of hair an inch in diameter on the heads of healthy men, and from week to week compared the intensity of growth of the short place with the rest of the hair. The result was surprising to this close and careful observer, as he found in some cases the numbers were equal, but generally the growth became slower after cutting, and he has never observed an increase in rapidity. I might also add that I believe many beardless faces and bald heads in middle and advancing age are often due to constant cutting and shaving in early life. The young girls and boys seen daily upon our streets with their closely-cropped heads and the young men with their clean-shaven faces are year by year by this fashion having their hair-forming apparatus overstrained.—Dr. Shoemaker.

Cheap Summer Drinks.

The strongest practical argument against total abstinence is the difficulty of obtaining any non-alcoholic beverage at once cheap and palatable. Many people do not like water, and even if they did, not all water is particularly wholesome, while hard workers always declare that water alone does not quench thirst. Haymakers, for example, never will drink water; they often drink more beer than is good for them, but they will drink unintoxicating beverages if these are supplied to them. A lump of ice improves most summer drinks, and, where ice is not to be had, the jugs or bottles should be set in a large pail of salt and water in the cellar, for salt and water is colder than water alone. The Indian plan of cooling water by keeping it in porous earthenware, from the surface of which evaporation continually goes on, is not made reasonable use of in this country. Porous earthenware is very easy to get, and the water in such a vessel set in the basement in a draught will soon be lowered several degrees of temperature. Perhaps it is not superfluous to add a warning against making these drinks too sweet. The sugar only excites thirst instead of quenching it, and though, of course, individual taste varies immensely, it is a very common fault, as much in unintoxicating drinks as in claret and champagne cup.

OATMEAL DRINK—mix one half pound of oatmeal with five gallons of cold water, boil it for a half an hour, and strain it through a rather coarse gravy-strainer; add brown sugar to taste while hot. It is very much improved by the addition of one-half ounce of citric acid. The thinly cut rind of two or three lemons or oranges may be boiled in it, or a still cheaper flavoring is to add, before boiling a bit of cinnamon stick or a few cloves. To be served cold.

RICE OR BARLEY DRINK.—Make as above, using broken rice or pot barley in the place of oatmeal.

LEMONADE—One ounce tartaric acid, one pound loaf sugar, one pint of boiling water, and twenty or thirty drops of essence of lemon. To be kept in a bottle and mixed with cold water as desired. Or, boil the rinds of two lemons in two quarts of water for ten minutes, add two ounces of citric acid, the juice of the lemons and 2 1-2 pounds of sugar. This also is to be mixed with water, and will keep, though not so long as the preceding. Slice the whole of a lemon into a jug, taking away all the pips and all the pith. Add sugar to the taste, and pour boiling water over. Let it stand at least twenty-four hours, to extract all the flavor of the fruit, and fill up with boiling water if needed. Some persons like the juice of an orange and a very small piece of peel added to each six or eight lemons; it gives a slightly bitter flavor.

APPLE WATER—Slice some well-flavored apples in a large jug, They need neither be peeled nor cored. Add three or four cloves and a strip of lemon peel and pour boiling water over. Let it stand twenty-four hours. It will be drinkable in twelve hours or less.

CURRANT WATER.—Put one quart of red currants and a half pint of raspberries, with two quarts of water, over a slow fire, to draw the juice for half an hour. They must not boil. Strain through a hair sieve and add another quart of water, in which about three fourths of a pound of sugar has been boiled to a syrup. Other fruit may be used in the same way.

CURRANT VINEGAR.—Put into a large basin two quarts of black currants, well bruised, and one pint of the best vinegar. Let it stand three or four days, and then strain it into an earthen jar, add 1 1-2 pounds of lump sugar; set the jar in a saucepan of cold water and water and boil for an hour. when cold, bottle. It is better if kept for a year. Raspberry vinegar may be made in the same way, but double the quantity of fruit is added, the second two quarts at the end of the first three days.

RASPBERRY ACID—Take any quantity of raspberries, put them into a jug, cover them with water previously acidulated with tartaric acid to the sharpness of lemon juice, let them remain twenty-four hours, then run the liquor through a sieve, taking care not to bruise the fruit. To each point of the clear liquor add 1 1-2 pounds of pounded loaf sugar; stir it frequently. When the sugar is quite dissolved, the syrup must be bottled. The whole process must be cold. The proportions are twelve pounds of raspberries, five ounces of acid, two quarts of water.

GINGER BEER—Pour three gallons of boiling water on 2 1-2 pounds of preserving sugar, three ounces of bruised ginger, and four lemons cut in very thin slices. Let it stand till nearly cold, then add a dessertspoonful of brewers' yeast spread on toast. Let it stand all night, then strain and bottle. Another way is to take one pound of sugar, one ounce of ginger, one-half ounce of carbonate of soda, one-half ounce of tartaric acid, and one-quarter ounce of cream of tartar. Well pound the ginger, put all in an earthen vessel, add a gallon of water not quite boiling, let it stand till cold, then put a tablespoonful of barm on toast, and let it stand till the next day. Bottle it, and lay it down for two days, when it will be ready for use."

Germination of Seed Wheat.

Dr. Sturtevant of the N. Y. Experimental station has been conducting some experiments to ascertain what proportion of the grains of wheat sown germinate and produce perfect plants. The grains were counted when sown, and then the plants in the fall and again in the spring. The variation in different samples was from seven to ninety-five per cent., the average being fifty-four. The black-bearded centennial wheat gave the smallest percentage of vegetation, and the smallest number that survived the winter. In one instance of 158 kernels planted, only 43 germinated and but three survived the winter. It is presumed that the wheat sown in all cases was plump and sound in appearance, and as good as the average sown by farmers; consequently taking the average number of grains that vegetate at about 60 per cent., the farmer needs to sow about two bushels per acre in order to be certain of one bushel germinating. One bushel of wheat per acre is certainly enough seed if every kernel germinates, but from the experiments of Dr. Sturtevant it would seem that it is difficult to obtain seed of which more than seventy-five per cent. will grow.

Cow-Itch.

Mr. O. S. Bliss remarks: "There are several diseses of the skin which are known in different places and to different persons as 'cow-itch.' In general the best 'simple' application for all affections of the skin is a mixture of lard and petroleum kerosene well rubbed in with the fingers. In some cases salt butter is preferable to lard. It is not necessary or desirable to daub on a large quantity, but only as much as can be rubbed in. Sometimes tobacco has been used effectively, and sometimes valuable animals have died apparently from the effects of its use. Mercurial and sulphur ointments are sometimes used, but they are not always safe and should never be used except as a last resort. I have heard of cases where the itch has been cured by the use of vinegar alone, but I cannot vouch for the disease having been the itch."

The Level Prairies.

Let no owner of the level prairie lands says the Des Moines Journal become disgusted with it on account of its wet, cold and unproductive condition at present. When rightly brought into cultivation these flat prairie farms will be the best, most productive and pleasantest farms in the state or nation. Thorough underdraining will make them all right. They contain the richest and finest soil either grain or grass. The nearest level have abundant facilities in fall for drainage. Do not sacrifice this rich inheritance to a foolish idea of seeking drier but less productive soil. Turn all of your means and energies to making it far superior to the lands which are so rolling as to be denuded of all their richer elements by the rapid wash by rains. Fifty years of experience and observation has revealed to us the total revolution in the value and productiveness of the rolling and the low, flat lands. The level upland prairies which are this year drowning out the crops, in ten or twenty years from now by the hand of industry will be made worth twice as much as the lands which are now rejoicing in the prospect of abundant crops. The flat lands have been accumulating for countless centuries by the decay of vegetable and mineral matter, a vast fund of plant food, almost inexhaustable, while that land which is dry enough for crops any season without aid in drainage, has had its fertility washed away by floods and rains to aid in building up the delta of the lower Mississippi. Keep your rich flat upland prairies, though they may be wet, miry and forbidding. They are the best and richest land the sun shines upon. And the day is close at hand when they will be fully appreciated, will produce the most certain and largest crops, and with less labor and more comfort to the farmer and his team. The road to this success is plain, unincumbered with doubt or danger.

Passing Events.

General Sherman, on being asked how he was getting along as secretary of war, in which position he has been acting during Mr. Lincoln's absence, replied, "Splendidly. For the first time since I came to Washington there is perfect harmony between the general of the army, and the secretary of war."

The electric light is making progress. It has now reached an obscure nook in the Alps, where the famous Kraus Grotto, near Gams, a combination of Stalactytes and crystals of gypsum, is to be lighted up by electricity.

Grace church, in Broadway, New York is to have a majestic $60,000 spire of marble in the place of the wooden spire which was recently taken down. This spire is to be 219 feet in height, and surmounted by a cross made of metal and glass, which, when illuminated at night, will be a conspicuous object for many miles around.

Good advice was given to the graduating class of Alleghany Theological seminary, when Dr. Wilson said: "Young gentlemen, study Hebrew roots, pore over Greek verbs, read Latin, and, if you have time, and desire, translate ancient hieroglyphics; but I charge you when you go into the pulpit to preach the gospel to use plain Anglo-saxon."

Some 2,000,000 children are being taught in the Japanese public schools on the American and English systems. Besides the schools under government control there are a great many private educational enterprises scattered about the country. With a view of training young men for special professions there are also schools and colleges in connection with the various departments, as also a school of foreign languages, medicines, translation, etc. Separate institutions are established for the education of girls and are meeting with good success.

Life is made up of surprises, but probably no one was ever more completely astonished than the subject of this story to the Newburyport Herald: "Formerly it was the custom, more than at present, 'to have up notes,' in the pulpit for loss of friends, etc. A neighboring clergyman on an exchange read a notice that Mr. A. desired prayers that the death of his wife might be sanctified to him, etc., and the clergyman prayed most earnestly for the brother sitting lonely and desolate in his pew, etc. He noticed a rustling in the congregation, and to his consternation learned that the note had been shut up in the Bible a year, and the man had his new wife for the first time in the pew. The good people smiled."

London Journals, while they admit that American girls are famous for an elegant and refined type of loveliness, that French ladies are the best dressed in the world, that the German youthful frauleins have the finest heads of hair, the Spanish girls the brightest eyes to be found anywhere, and that in Venice and Florence may be seen to this day direct decendants of those old world blonde beauties still fresh and fair on Titien's canvas, claim that young English ladies remain ampler in limb, clearer of complexion, and more hearty than any others. This they attribute to plain food, sound sleep, suitable clothing, exersise in the open air, and a plentiful application of soap and water.

Eighteen years, so like a span in the every-day world, stretch out into an age in the petroleum regions. In June 1865, Pithole City was the wonder of a continent; Titusville was at the height of its prosperity; cities blossomed in a day and wealth grew on every bush. To-day Pithole City is but a memory; the people of the lower oil country have swarmed northward, and towns and cities have vanished like the mirage at noonday. Countless acres, miles of the country, have been left in ruins, and out of it all only Oil City, Titusville, and the Titusville Morning Herald, which celebrated its eighteenth anniversary the other day are left standing.

Some very interesting statistics bearing on capital punishment have recently been published in Berlin. Between the years 1864 and 1868, 218 persons were condemned in Germany to decapitation, and of these only 26 were executed. Between 1868 and 1878 no fewer than 428 were condemned, but in no case was the sentence carried out. In the year 1878, however, Hodel was executed for his attempt on the Emperor, but in 1879, and 1880 there were no executions. Since 1881 there has been only 3. The German executioner is named Krants, and he has four assistants, who are also paid by the state. It is their duty to divest the culprit of the outer clothing, and then to bind him with leather thongs to the block. It is said to be a boast with Krants that he wields his ax so cleverly that he always severs the head from the body at the first stroke.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 5

Knute Nelson of Aldal was in the city on Tuesday.

The County Board of Equalization meets on Monday next.

Court re-convened on Tuesday with Judge Stearns presiding.

Archie McKinnon returned on Friday last from a visit to his old home in Canada.

The foundation for the Congregational church is being laid and the good work goes bravely on.

M. E. Filiatrault brought in a sample of his wheat which is over three feet high and heading out.

Mr. W. H. Foote, of Euclid, has purchased a house and lot in the city and will return to the city to reside.

Charlie Seeley has taken a short furlough and gone to Chicago, leaving Jack in charge of Seeley's Exchange until his return.

Wm. Kistenmacher and wife have been heard from after their safe arrival in Germany. They are enjoying their visit hugely.

Mr. J. L. Bailey brought in a sample of barley, on Monday that was 3½ feet in length. He has a large field of the same kind near Kittson.

Esquire Lewis was called up to the Canada house to unite in the holy bonds of wedlock, Mr. Peter O. Lewis, and Miss. Philda Thomson, all of Polk County.

The Northern Tier has changed hands twice lately. First from J. K. Arnold to Stark and Arnold and now to Stark and Kaiser. J. K. is still retained as editor-in-cheif.

Ole Bang will receive a carload of the celebrated Michel's LaCrosse bottle beer in a day or so for the wholesale agent, Thomas Ulven, who will sell it out by wholesale.

It is the general opinion that while grain is not yet seriously injured that we must have rain within a few days or it will be. Marshal and Kittson Counties caught a soaker on Wednesday and appearances indicate that we shall have rain here soon.

Alex Anderson left Fergus Falls Friday night to join his father, Michael Anderson, at Seattle, Washington Territory. Aleck expects to take up a pine claim and grow up with the country. You might say, without punning, that he goes to Seattle in Washington Territory

Mr. H. H. Hinman was relieved of about $80 and a gold watch by an enterprising burglar Sunday night. The party entered Mr. Hinmans sleeping room sometime in the night and gobbled his clothing, took it outside sifted the pockets, leaving the clothing on the streets. It was evedently the work of professionals.

Our Maple Lake Letter

The Fourth was put in in good shape. Fred Date had his big sail boat out with an organ on board, and hundreds of lesser crafts were on the water. Jack Coufair opened out his new hotel with a big dance which was well attended. Altogether the day was highly enjoyed by all who participated in the festivities of the occasion.

Our Fertile Letter.

Fertile celebrated the over glorious in good shape. It was enjoyed by hundreds, among the many were I. W. Kimberley and the Messrs Murphy, H. Budd and wife, Walter Jackson, J. H. Massey, C. Ahl, and many others. Dr. A, Nelson and S. LaDue delivered themselves of an eloquent oration each, marshals Kankle and Grodevig preserved excellent order during the day and evening. A grand dance was begun in the afternoon and lasted through out the day and evening. In the evening a fine display of fireworks was had and all united in pronouncing the afair a spleudid one.

A Sad and Fatal Accident.

On Friday morning, at about 7 o'clock Mr. J. Rudolph Chiniquy received a fatal wound by the accideutal discharge of a shot gun in his own hands. Two physicians, Dr. Dampier and Dr. Gaboury, were instantly summoned who did all in their power to aid but with no avail, as the whole charge passed through the right breast almost entirely through his body carrying along bits of the clothing and wadding with the shot. Mr. Chiniquy lingered until Saturday and quietly breathed his last. On Tuesday a large concourse of people gathered at the Catholic church to pay the last sad respects to their late companion and friend and the body was conveyed to the depot to be taken to Chicago, accompanied by C. A. Chiniquy and N. F. Chiniquy and wife. Rudolph was universally liked and his presence will be missed by a large circle of friends who unite with us in extending sympathy to the bereaved relatives.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

The new school house is rapidly nearing completion, and looks magnificent.

Abe Reynolds says he has wheat on his farm which measures 24 inches in length! Who says this is not a prolific county for No. 1—wheat?

Work has commenced on the iron bridge to span the Red Lake river, near the point. The contractors have until about the middle of July to finish it.

The entire Courier force is "paralyzed this week. With a carbuncle on the neck, a fractured collar-bone and a slight attack of "brokeupativeness," we barely manage to get out this issue of Courier.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 5.

St. Hilaire Lacket.

From the spectator.

Crookston is represented in town to day by Mr. Juve of the firm of Juve & Bergeland.

Mr. George, of the firm of Beecher & George, the Crookston druggist was in town sizing us up, on Saturday last.

The eye of the weary and hungry traveler lights up with pleasure as it rests upon the new and handsome sign, "European Hotel," which Judge Robbecke has just put up for public scrutiny.

The new two seated carrage which Mr. C. C Utzinger is sporting around town was manufactred at McKinnon Bros., Crookston. Mr. U. has now the finest rig in town and one that cannot be surpassed in the County.

Ole Sandmoen wanted a new pair of shoes in which to celebrate the Fourth and seeing a nice pair in front of Foss, store, went and helped himself. He was caught in the act, however, and after a lively chase captured and the stolen goods returned to the owner.

Hon. Paul C. Sletten, of Crookston, has accepted an invitation to come up to St. Hilaire and address the people in the Norwegian language upon the Fourth of July. This will be a treat to our Skandinavian friends, as Mr Sletten has the reputation of being a very eloquent speaker.

We are shown a sample of wheat yesterday grown on the farm of B. W. Crosby, which measured 14 inches, Mr. C. says he has 40 acres of which the above was a fair sample. The wheat in this vicinity never looked better at this time of the year and the farmers say that if the weather continues favorable they will thresh 10 bushels this fall to every one last year.

Fisher's Fancies

From the Bulletin.

The man arrested yesterday for disturbing himself too much for the good of other people, is booked for St. Peter. He had on a straw hat and looked like a dude.

Two railroads approaching Fisher at one time ought to make the heart of the acerage resident rejoice. The surveyors of the Brainerd road are near Red Lake Falls, and a large force of men at work on the Moorhead Northern promise something tangible for the faith within.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

The Walker log drive is tied up at Poplar River.—Our plasterers have their hands full.—Dunc Terry keeps right on making his daily trips, from Crookston.—Trade is dull yet our merchants have about all they can attend to.—E. M. Walsh and lady were up from Crookston on Monday.—There is talk of a daily hack to Black River—John Leo, D. C. Wright, J. K. Chiniquy and Dunc Morris were up from Crookton during the past week.—The Prentice and McClutches brick kiln is fired up.—Mr. Sanders has good water in his well, less than twenty feet deep.—There is a steady demand for farm property in this vicinity.—What do the Crookston mill men mean? Their dam is so constructed that no fish can get above it.—Work on Kretzschmar race is practically done. Next Monday work on the dam commences.—Red Lake Falls will celebrate the Fourth in grand style.

A GREAT AMUSEMENT VENTURE.

All Previous Exhibitions Outdone—Oriental Features Added.

Real Bedawin Arabs Under Canvas.

From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

After several month's hibernation in St. Louis, W. W. Cole's Consolidated Shows start out on a tour of the United States with the firm determination to not only surpass all previous exhibitions, but to overshadow anything that will, this season, have an existence. For years Cole's Circus and Menagerie has enjoyed a most enviable reputation, and since its return from a journey around the world it has been particularly prominent, in that its general character was far above the ordinary run of canvas entertainments. Its neat and wholesome appearance and remarkable diversity of programme awakened the most intense interest of its patrons, and commanded the undivided approval of the press. It stood in the same scale of comparison, with its contemporaries, as the drama or opera to the undignified variety show. The success that naturally attended this marked revolution was most flattering to the proprietor, and at the close of last season's tour, Mr. Cole set at work to henceforth and forever stand at the head of all amusement ventures, in both magnitude and merit, the twin motives that makes perfection possible. Agents were at once dispatched to all parts of the world in search of undiscovered novelties, mechanics, artists' designers, and manufacturers were employed in making, building, decorating, and constructing a new line of strange objects; useful paraphernalia ponderous cars, gorgeous wagons, tableaux, cages, vans, and chariots. Everything is now perfected. Features from foreign lands have arrived, and the most novel attractions and distinguished artists of this country have been engaged. A troupe of twelve performing Bedouin Arabs has been imported, and this feature alone bids fair to prove the most interesting novelty of the age. These nomads of the desert are genuine representatives of the Arab race, and will appear in a series of peculiar performances which defy description. They will form lofty pyramids, vault over lines of fixed bayonets, and give life-like characteristic scenes of Arabian warfare, halts in the deserts, harem life, feats of juggling, and various other oriental features. An enormous theatre stage is to be erected, whereon Russian roller skaters and other novelties will be produced. Three circus rings, side-by-side, are necessary to present the many features of this great show. All the riders perform their equestrian feats on bare-back horses. Rival riders will appear in the same ring. The Menagerie is a marvel of greatness, and contains nearly every known variety of beasts, birds, and reptiles; including "Samson," the largest Asiatic elephant ever in captivity. Among the many human wonders are the Seven Sutherland Sisters, whose beautiful tresses of hair trail the ground, and hangs in masses nearly four inches thick. And thus sensation after sensation could be mentioned until the sum total reached thousands, but space forbids. That Cole has accomplished an unexampled undertaking is positively certain and the magnitude of this colossal shows has yet to find a paralled. An early visit to Crookston Saturday, July 21st.

Uncle Tom.

The Double Shuffle Uncle Tom's Combination Cabin Company appeared in Ericsson's Hall on Thursday evening of last week to a full house. For several reasons the performance was very unsatisfactory. In the first place the stage was altogether too small, the hall is too poorly ventilated, the company were to leave on the 11 p. m. train north and for that reason had to cut down about one-half, thus leaving out many very affecting scenes and passages. So far as the simon pure Uncle Tom part was concerned the company made a flat failure of it by omissions, by lack of time and and by very evident carelessness as to how they got through with it. In the touching and affecting scene where the dying Eva beseeches her papa to give Uncle Tom his freedom the effect was wholly spoiled by the "little Eva," who for some cause unknown to her audience, was grinning like a sick monkey during the whole rendition of her part. There was something behind the scenes during the whole of the performance that the audience did not catch on to. One of the Topsys, the smaller, was passably good, could have beat it had she chosen. Miss "Teely" was too indifferent for anything except to get through with it in some shape and off for Winnipeg and we suspect that this was the keynote for the whole company, except, perhaps the darkies who sang breakdowns and reels and who seemed to enter into the spirit of the thing with refreshing enthusiasm. The barber shop scene, wherein one darkey shaved another, cut his hair, blacked his boots and brushed him off, all the while keeping up an incessant rattling of the bones, was excellently well done and hard to beat. Only for the darkies the whole business would have been a flat failure, owing to the indifference of the company on a small stage with limited time, for it was very evident that the company are first-class actors under favorable circumstances and can do Uncle Tom justice when they are a mind to.

John Stevenson, road overseer for the town of Grand Forks, D. T., has the following to say in the Grand Forks Herald: "I wish to give you my experience. Our town bought a New Era grader and as I hold the position of road overseer, it was placed under my charge. I have been paying $25 per day for men and teams to run the machine, and in ten days have built over five miles of road, such as could not have been made at less than $1.00 per rod with plows and scrapers, or $320 per mile. A better road constructed with the New Era grader cost only $50 per mile. If I had seen the above statement in print I should not have believed it as it looks unreasonable, but it costs nothing to see the road that I refer to. I invite all who are interested in the welfare of the Red River Valley to come and see for themselves and see the benefits derived from ditching and making roads, I am a farmer and live on my farm, three miles south of Grand Forks. I write this to show that there is no town in the Red River Valley too poor to buy a grader and thus have first-class roads and plenty of ditches and keep out of the mud. Five miles of road constructed with plows and scrapers would cost $320 per mile, or $1,600 for the five miles. With the New Era grader the same amount of road, as I have practically demonstrated, would cost $50 per mile, or a total for the five miles of only $250, a saving of $1,350 in ten day's work. Our grader handles from fifteen to eighteen hundred cubic yards of earth per day." The above speaks all that is necessary—it is truth.

Wilkin County Record:—It is said that a young man at Wilmar sat down the other day and wrote on the back of a couple of postal cards; then turned them over and directed them. By some mischance he placed the addresses upon the wrong cards. The result was a prominent shirt factory in St. Paul received a polite invitation to take a carrage ride somewhere on the Wilmar turnpike, while the young man's girl was made frantic by receiving the following! "Please send me samples of the cloth your shirts are made of."

In May last the JOURNAL published a letter from P. C. Sletten, Esq, to the Hon. Knute Nelson in which Mr. Nelson's attention was called to the lands in controversy between the settlers and the railroad company. As an evidence that something was done in the matter we learn that the Land Office at Crookston has been notified to accept the final proof of two of the settlers mentioned in the letter, and we are told that the balance of the cases will be settled in the same way.

VOL. VII. CROOKSTON, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA, THURSDAY, JULY 12, 1883. NO. 11

Extra Session of the Board of County Commissioners.

At an adjourned session of the Board County Commissioners held in their office in the city of Crookston, on the 20th day of June 1883, all members being present, on motion the meeting was declared open and the following business transacted: Minutes of last session read and approved. The chairman was authorised to procure a small house for Mrs. La Plante. The sum of $160 was allowed Mrs. Sankey for board and care of Fred House, and said Mrs. Sankey was notified that no further aid would be extended towards boarding or care of said House, and she was requested to bring the said House to Crookston and present him before the Board on the 21st inst. On motion the sum of $75 was appropriated towards purchasing a ticket from Fisher, Minn., to Christiana, Norway, for Rasmus Erickson, pauper. Commissioner Bradish was authorized to issue an order for amount due for boarding said Erickson. On motion the sum of $300 was appropriated for road and bridge purposes to each of the Commissioner Districts in the county, said amount to be expended under the supervision of the Commissiomer of each District respectively. The petition of Louis Barthiaume and others for erecting a bridge across a creek at Pierre Biaudette's was referred to Commissioner Gervais. The petition of Joseph Martell and others for changing the boundaries of School Districts No. 12 and 45 was received and a hearing set at next session of the Board.

Board adjourned till 21st June at 9 a. m.

Board met pursuant to adjournment, all members present. On motion the sum of $200 was appropriated to Grand Forks Township for the purpose of erecting a lock-up in the said town provided that a good and sufficint bond be filed, conditional that the amount herein appropriated shall be refunded and paid back to the County Treasurer when East Grand Forks is incorporated as a village.

On motion the contract for building a bridge across Red Lake River near Mallory station, was awarded to Jones & Hewett of Minneapolis at $6,000, payable as follows, $2,000 in January and $4,000 payable in July 1884.

The petition of Peter Swansen was received and a hearing set at next session.

The petition of Stephen Reark and others was received and on motion the same was granted and ordered that Sections 31, 32, 33, 34, 35 and 36, Township 152, Range 44, be attached to District No. 43. The sum of $200 was appropriated to Gervais Township towards erecting bridges in said town.

On motion the following liquor licenses were granted.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

FARMERS' COLUMN.

For the Cook.

STUFFED CABBAGE.—Take a large fresh cabbage and cut out the heart; fill the vacancy with stuffing made of cooked chicken or veal chopped very fine and highly seasoned, and rolled into balls with yolk of eggs. Tie the cabbage firmly together and boil in a covered kettle for two hours.

CHICKEN CHEESE.—Mother's recipe for tough chickens was to boil in water enough to keep from burning till quite tender. Take them out when done remove the bones, mince the meat fine, and season with salt, pepper and butter; then return to the water and cook till the liquor is absorbed. Pour into a dish or mold, and put a plate over it, pressing down with a weight. Set in a cool place, and when firm it will be relished for breakfast, dinner or tea.

LEMON PIE.—To every lemon used, [I generally take two,] take two cups of sugar, two cups of boiling water, butter the size of a walnut, and one cup of crushed cracker. I mix thus: Grate the yellow rind all off into the bowl, then put in the sugar, butter, yolk of an egg, and while you rub this to a cream put the lemons into the oven and let them harden until you have creamed the contents of the bowl, then squeeze the lemons into the cup, taking out all the seed, (the lemons will make a cup two-thirds full of juice,) pour it into the bowl with the sugar, etc., then measure your boiling water, two cups for every lemon, after which put in the crushed cracker, bake in an under crust, and finish with the whites of the eggs beaten to a stiff froth with a little sugar, say three teaspoonfuls, and if they are not "two story pies," they are not like mine. Two large lemons or three small ones make seven pies.

A delicious tomato soup is made by frying some bits of beef and ham in a saucepan with a lump of butter and a small onion sliced. Take a quart can of tomatoes, or a dozen fresh ones (medium or small-sized), add a coffee cup of stock and then put the meat in with it and boil; season with pepper and salt. This may be strained or not; of course, it is better taste to strain it; if the soup seems too thin after it is strained, put it back on the stove, add a tablespoonful of flour rubbed smooth in cold water, and let the soup simmer gently for half an hour. In making any kind of soup it is much better to let it simmer gently than to boil violently—nothing is gained, not even time, by the latter process, as anything will cook just as quickly without it. It is the degree of heat to which the soup is subjected which cooks it, and flavor suffers by rapid evaporation.

Peas in the Fall.

The way to raise the finest quality of peas is, after the first sowing, to plant them deep and mulch them, so that the soil they root in is always cool and moist. In the careless manner in which peas are frequently cultivated they have very little flavor and delicacy. It is so with raising what is called the snap-short beans. They are seldom planted deep enough, and as a consequence have no more flavor than a piece of india rubber and about as tough; but the beans planted in September, and in due time for sale in our markets, are really delicious in flavor and fairly melt in the mouth. This is the result of cool soil. But were these beans planted three and four inches deep, as we have more than once suggested, throughout the season, and mulched in the hottest portion of it, we could have, as with the peas, these vegetables at all times up to November in perfection.

Kindness Counts in Horse-Training.

The great secret in training horses is to make haste slowly, and at all times to use persuasion and firmness in preference to compulsion or force. Nothing can be more absurd than the idea I find generally obtaining in regard to this, that to make a horse understand anything it must be beaten into him. The thing to do in training a horse is to go about it naturally, to reason with him always deliberately and kindly, and make him understand that you are his friend. I never have found that coaxing and invariably kind treatment spoiled a horse. On the other hand, the same as with man, none of the best horses will yield to beating. In all or any of the difficult performances of my own horses, it is impossible for me to force the animals to do anything by whipping, and I never resort to it. My rule always is to combine kindness with firmness and to teach them slowly, and, doing this, I experience but little trouble. If a horse is very nervous and easily subject to alarm the best method is always to treat him gently and with consideration. Find out the reasons or objects which affect or frighten him and make him immediately familiar with them. Show him that none of them will hurt him. Among the first lessons which a colt learns from its dam is that of fear of certain objects, and the effect is always lasting. In training horses it is necessary as far as possible to uproot this inherited fear, and to make it plain to them that you intend to befriend them. As all the runaways among horses are caused through fear, so the majority might easily be prevented if only the simplest natural precaution were taken.—Prof. George Bartholomew.

What To Teach Girls.

The woman who is to be happy and useful as the maker and mistress of a home must know the art of home making and home ruling. Yet how very small a place is given to the teaching of these arts in our schemes of education for girls. We should call that man a fool who hoped to see his son successful as a merchant or banker but neglected to have him instructed in the principles of arithmetic and book-keeping. But thousands of girls are married every year who do not know how to make a loaf of bread; or to set a table, or to iron a napkin, or to make a bed becomingly. It is expected that servants shall do these things? So the young man who is to be made into a merchant or banker will have his book keepers to write out his accounts and make his arithmetical calculations for him, but he must understand these processes for himself, or he will be at the mercy of his servants. Moreover, in the woman's case, there may not always be servants or the means with which to command their services, and their incompetence at best needs the supervision of a mistress skilled in all their arts. This seems a homely matter, doubtless, to those persons who see the complete salvation of women in university education, but it is a matter which touches the happiness of women themselves, and closely concerns the well-being of a world whose whole life centers in and is founded upon the home. It is not too much to say that no girl ought ever to come to maturity without having acquired both skill and taste in every art of the household, or that no woman deficient in this particular can marry without serious risk to her own happiness and to that of the persons about her. It does nobody any harm for the mistress of a household to know how to calculate an eclipse, but it is disastrous for her to be herself eclipsed by her Bridget.—G. C. Eggleston in Harper's for July.

Women as Private Secretaries and Type Writers.

It has been found by business men who have availed themselves of woman's work in type writing that women possess the inestimable advantage of not being the rivals of their employers. A man acting the part of private secretary or confidential clerk may leave his employer at any moment and set up for himself. With young women the case is different. For reasons which everybody recognizes, but which, perhaps, will not hold good forever, they are not regarded by business men as possible rivals. In the next place, "My private secretary," said a well known solicitor of patents the other day, nodding in the direction of a young woman who sat in front of a type writer, "has been in the office two years and has never lost a day, nor an hour." The average salary of such a secretary is $500 a year. Sometimes a thousand dollars is earned. The use of the type writer can be learned in a week, and after a practice of three or four weeks a clever girl can write faster than a penman. Persons who can play on the pianoforte become proficient in a shorter time. In any case it is comparatively easy to become a first class operator. An hour or two a day is as much as any young woman ought to practice when beginning. To become a first class phonographer or short hand writer is much more difficult. The young woman who begins at the age of twelve or ten years is likely to succeed the soonest. The best private secretary is one who can write short hand and can operate a type writer. She is able to take down answers to letters, and then to make copies on the type writer from her phonographic notes. The business of a firm of solicitors for patents has so increased since the advent of the type writer (their days seem to have become longer, because so much more work can be done in a day) that they are training in their office two or three young women to become operators upon it, who meanwhile make themselves generally useful, and receive for their services $6 or $10 a month. After a year so spent these pupils will earn $40 a month. Young men, if applying at this office for similar positions, would be told frankly that experience had led the firm to prefer the services of the gentler sex. There the rooms are bright and cheerful, and I noticed that during an interval of her task one of the operators had been refreshing herself with a novel, in strict accordance with the privileges of her position.—Harper's Bazar.

Feed For Young Pigs.

From the Western Rural.

Perhaps there are no greater mistakes made in feeding animals than is often the case with pigs. Indeed, we are inclined to think that the climax of expensive absurdity is reached in swine feeding. Often animals do grow and develop in spite of very bad feeding. But our swine, we might almost say as a rule, do not develop, and somehow we get the idea that fat is growth. If we do not make this mistake almost from the beginning, we are entirely too apt to fall into the error before the pig reaches maturity. It is always a very great mistake, and the earlier in the life of the pig that we begin to make it; the greater mistake it is. To expect a young pig to develop bone and muscle, without feeding it anything that will make bone and muscle is a great absurdity. Yet that would often seem to be theory in hog raising. After its birth the pig is either left to take care of itself, the dam not even being properly fed sometimes, or is fed upon that reprehensible theory that fat is growth. Men have been known to feed all the corn meal that the young man animal would eat, just as soon as it could be taught to eat corn meal. What could naturally be expected as the result of such a course? Corn meal contains sixty-six per cent. of starch, seven per cent. of fat, ten per cent. of nitrogenous elements, and scarcely any phosphate of lime. Now a growing pig can be literally starved to death upon such a ration, although it may be so fat that it cannot stand upon its feet. Indeed, its inability to stand upon its feet would soon manifest itself, and would be an evidence that it was starved. Its legs would not be strong enough to hold it. Its bones and muscular system would have nothing to feed upon, and must necessarily grow weak, at least weak in proportion to its age and growth of fat. There would all the time be a demand for an increase of muscular and bony strength to support the growing weight, and no response whatever to the demand.

In the artificial feeding of young pigs skim milk stands at the head of food, and when there is plenty of that there need be no serious uneasiness about results. Cooked corn meal may be advantageously added in small quantities to the milk—provided there is plenty of milk, as it is the milk that will furnish the albuminoids and mineral elements. Indeed the proportion of these is so very large, that to produce the very best results corn meal in proportion of say about one pound to a quart of milk, is very desirable. This ration about equalizes the albuminoids and fat producing elements, as required by the animal system. If the farmer does not have the milk, cooked corn meal, and oats in equal parts and one part of oil meal will prove to be a good ration. Some grind oats and peas together, and feed cooked, and others feed six parts of peas, and four parts of corn and one part of flaxseed. If your pigs do not gain as much as a pound a day in live weight we can conclude at once that there is a radical defect in our system of feeding. The young pig should be fed liquid food, as that is more easily digested, and should, after weaning be fed five or six times a day for a considerable time, after which the number of times can be reduced.

Of course, the feeder will not undervalue grass as a food for pigs. If he does he will dispense with a very cheap means of feeding, and injure the animal besides. It will not answer to feed growing animals wholly upon concentrated food. Concentrated food enters the stomach in a solid mass, and it requires time for the gastric juice to mix with it and digest it. But if with the concentrated food grass is fed, the mass is loosened up and the gastric juice has a greater surface to attack. And there is one other very important matter to be taken into consideration in connection with pigs running upon grass. It furnishes them exercise, and exercise the reader need not be told, is about as important as food. It is true that a pig does need a quarter section to range over to get exercise enough, but on the other hand, it should not be too closely confined, and if on pasture it will be no danger of that. If it has plenty of room it is sometimes the case that soiling is very profitable. It requires less land to support a pig if the soiling is adopted, and where there are not many pigs it is altogether practical and profitable.

Mr. J. C. Hartshorn, of Providence, R. I., is visiting Richmond, Va., to perfect arrangements for the erection of a building to cost $20,000 to be used as a school for colored girls. Mr. Hartshorn will furnish the entire amount required.

NO HOME EXEMPT.

The Source of Those Mysterious Troubles That Come to Every Household Explained.

The following article from the Democrat and Chronicle, of Rochester, N. Y., is of so striking a nature and emanates from so reliable a source, that it is herewith re-published entire. In addition to the valuable matter it contains, it will be found exceedingly interesting:

To the Editor of the Democrat and Chronicle.

SIR:—My motives for the publication of the most unusual statements which follow, are, first, gratitude for the fact that I have been saved from a most horrible death, and, secondly, a desire to warn all who read this statement against some of the most deceptive influences by which they have ever been surrounded. It is a fact that to-day thousands of people are within a foot of the grave and they do not know it. To tell how I was caught away from just this position and to warn others against nearing it, are my objects in this communication.

On the first day of June, 1881, I lay at my residence in this city surrounded by my friends and waiting for death. Heaven only knows the agony I then endured, for words can never describe it. And yet, if a few years previous, any one had told me that I was to be brought so low, and by so terrible a disease, I should have scoffed at the idea. I had always been uncommonly strong and healthy, had weighed over 200 pounds and hardly knew, in my own experience, what pain or sickness were. Very many people who will read this statement realize at times that they are unusually tired and cannot account for it. They feel dull and indefinite pains in various parts of the body and do not understand it. Or they are exceedingly hungry one day and entirely without appetite the next. This was just the way I felt when the relentless malady which had fastened itself upon me first began. Still I thought it was nothing; that probably I had taken a cold which would soon pass away. Shortly after this I noticed a heavy, and at times a neuralgic, pain in my head, but as it would come one day and be gone the next, I paid but little attention to it. However, my stomach was out of order and my food often failed to digest, causing at times great inconvenience. Yet I had no idea, even as a physician, that these things meant anything serious or that a monstrous disease was becoming fixed upon me. Candidly, I thought I was suffering from Malaria and so doctored myself accordingly. But I got no better. I next noticed a peculiar color and odor about the fluids I was passing—also that there were large quantities one day and very little the next, and that a persistent froth and scum appeared upon the surface, and a sediment settled in the bottom. And yet I did not realize my danger, for, indeed, seeing these symptoms continually, I finally became accustomed to them, and my suspicion was wholly disarmed by the fact that I had no pain in the affected organs or in their vicinity. Why I should have been so blind I cannot understand.

There is a terrible future for all physical neglect, and impending danger always brings a person to his senses, even though it may then be too late. I realized, at last my critical condition and aroused myself to overcome it. And, Oh! how hard I tried! I consulted the best medical skill in the land. I visited all the prominent mineral springs in America and travelled from Maine to California. Still I grew worse. No two physicians agreed as to my malady. One said I was troubled with spinal irritation: another, heart disease; another general debility; another nervous prostration; another, malaria; another, dyspepsia; another, congestion of the base of the brain; and so on through a long list of common diseases, the symptoms of all of which I really had. In this way several years passed, during all of which time I was steadily growing worse. My condition had really become pitiable. The slight symptoms I at first experienced were developed into terrible and constant disorders—the little twigs of pain had grown to oaks of agony. My weight had been reduced from 207 to 130 pounds. My life was a torture to myself and friends. I could retain no food upon my stomach, and lived wholly by injections. I was a living mass of pain. My pulse was uncontrollable. In my agony I frequently fell upon the floor, convulsively clutched the carpet, and prayed for death. Morphine had little or no effect in deadening the pain. For six days and nights I had the death-premonitory hiccoughs constantly. My urine was filled with tube casts and albumen. I was struggling with Bright's Disease of the kidneys in its last stages.

While suffering thus I received a call from my pastor, the Rev. Dr. Foote, rector of St. Paul's church, of this city. I felt that it was our last interview, but in the course of conversation he mentioned a remedy of which I had heard much but had never used. Dr. Foote detailed to me the many remarkable cures which had come under his observation, by means of this remedy, and urged me to try it. As a practicing physician and a graduate of the schools, I cherished the prejudice both natural and common with all regular practitioners, and derided the idea of any medicine outside the regular channels being the least beneficial. So solicitous, however, was Dr. Foote, that I finally promised I would waive my prejudice and try the remedy he so highly recommended. I began its use on the 1st day of June and took it according to directions. At first it sickened me; but this I thought was a good sign for me in my debilitated condition. I continued to take it; the sickening sensation departed and I was able to retain food upon my stomach. In a few days I noticed a decided change for the better as also did my wife and friends. My hiccoughs ceased and I experienced less pain than formerly. I was so rejoiced at this improved condition that, upon what I had believed but a few days before was my dying bed, I vowed, in the presence of my family and friends, should I recover I would both publicly and privately make known this remedy for the good of humanity, wherever and whenever I had an opportunity. I also determined that I would give a course of lectures in the Corinthian Academy of Music in this city, stating in full the symptoms and almost hopelessness of my disease and the remarkable means by which I have been saved. My improvement was constant from that time, and in less than three months I had gained 26 pounds in flesh, became entirely free from pain and I believe I owe my life and present condition wholly to Warner's Safe Cure, the remedy which I used.

Since my recovery I have thoroughly re-investigated the subject of kidney difficulties and Bright's disease, and the truths developed are astounding. I therefore state, deliberately, and as a physician, that I believe more than one-half the deaths which occur in America are caused by Bright's disease of the kidneys. This may sound like a rash statement, but I am prepared to fully verify it. Bright's disease has no distinctive symptoms of its own, (indeed, it often develops without any pain whatever in the kidneys or their vicinity), but has the symptoms of nearly every other known complaint. Hundreds of people die daily, whose burials are authorized by a physician's certificate of "Heart Disease," "Apoplexy," "Paralysis," "Spinal Complaint," "Rheumatism," "Pneumonia," and other common diseases, when in reality it was Bright's disease of the kidneys. Few physicians, and fewer people, realize the extent of this disease or its dangerous and insiduous nature. It steals into the system like a thief, manifests its presence by the commonest symptoms, and fastens itself upon the constitution before the victim is aware. It is nearly as hereditary as consumption, quite as common and fully as fatal. Entire families, inheriting it from their ancestors, have died, and yet none of the number knew or realized the mysterious power which was removing them. Instead of common symptoms it often shows none whatever, but brings death suddenly, and as such is usually supposed to be heart disease. As one who has suffered, and knows by bitter experience what he says, I implore every one who reads these words not to neglect the slightest symptom of kidney difficulty. Certain agony and possible death will be the sure result of such neglect, and no one can afford to hazard such chances.

I am aware that such an unqualified statement as this, coming from me, known as I am, throughout the entire land as a practitioner and lecturer, will arouse the surprise and possible animosity of the medical profession and astonish all with whom I am acquainted, but I make the foregoing statements, based upon facts which I am prepared to produce, and truths which I can substantiate to the letter. The welfare of those who may possibly be sufferers such as I was, is an ample inducement for me to take the step I have, and if I can successfully warn others from the dangerous path in which I once walked, I am willing to endure all professional and personal consequences.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

Together they rattle along the street,
Those old-time chums called wind and rain,
Playing the strangest tricks with your feet,
Till you tumble and stagger again.
But little care I
While I can see
A light in the window
At home for me.

I hasten faster, with heart grown light,
I can almost see the cozy room.
Defiance to you, Storm King, to-night;
You can't keep me out in the gloom,
For the beacon is bright
And I can see
A face in the window
At home for me.

Cheerily blinking the street lamps shine
Waiting to see the doors flung wide,
And in the radiance of home divine
Some one's waiting inside.
Some one's waiting,
And I can see
Red lips holding
A kiss for me!

THE BATTLE AT THE BALES.

A Fate that Gen. Jackson Had in Reserve for the British.

From the Louisville Journal.

Your correspondent "Secretario," from New Orleans, states in your issue Sunday, November 27, 1881, in his article on "Lafitte, the Pirate," concerning the death of Gen. Sir Edward Packenham, commander-in chief of the British forces, the following:

"The last act of his eventful career was the culmination of his long-treasured revenge, and served also to restore him to favor with the people and authorities of Louisiana, whose laws he had so long set at defiance. It was at the battle of New Orleans. He was the genius of the great battle. His blood boiled at the sight of the red-coats. 'Les Anglais perfides!' he shouted to his men; 'make every shot tell! Fire low, my boys!' he thundered to them, and his were the first guns to fire. Later in the battle a general officer is seen to lead the British forces. He mounts the parapet, waving his sword and cheering his men. Lafitte sprang forward with a pistol in hand—a flash, and Packenham falls mortally wounded. The victory is gained and Lafitte's revenge sated."

His letter is headed "The Romance of Piracy." This account of the death of Sir Edward Packenham is certainly a romance, and far, very far, from the truth as it ought to appear in history. I learned the full particulars of Gen. Packenham's death from a very intimate friend of my father, Col. Wm. McCutchen of Mason's Point, Humphrey's county, Tenn. The old hero was on the ground at the time Packenham was killed, and commanded a picked company of marksmen from a Tennesee regiment. Col. McCutchen was a man noted for his strict integrity and love of truth; consequently his statement of this affair is entitled to a full belief in its truthfulness. I will now give you his version of Gen. Packenham's death, as clearly and as briefly as I can, and precisely as I have often heard him detail it around my father's fireside in the long ago. Col. McCutchen commanded a company of infantry from Williamson county, Tenn., and was ordered by Gen. Jackson, who knew him as a "very clear sighted marksman," to pick a company of choice riflemen from his regiment to "shoot the British officers, and to shoot them alone." He did so, and had under his command the best shots in the army, and was stationed near the center of the line of breastworks running at right angles from the river. The Mississippi was extremely high at the time of the battle of New Orleans—so high as to be within a few inches of the top of the levee—thereby creating some fear that it might break over and drown both armies. Col. McCutchen says the British regulars—men who had fought Napoleon on the Peninsula of Spain and drove that haughty conqueror from his prey—came up to the attack beautifully, bringing facines with them to fill up the ditch in our front so that the rear lines could cross over with ease, and thus scale our breastworks. The colonel remarked, with a solemn air, that the first lines melted away like frost before a warm sun, and helped to fill up the ditch themselves from the intense and deadly fire of our riflemen. They were repulsed a second time with terrible slaughter, broke and fell back under a fire that they had never met before, even from Napoleon's best troops. Again, a third time they rushed to the attack, evidently led by some superior officer, for they came rushing up with unusual vigor and steadiness. All at once a lull in the battle revealed the fact that something dreadful and unexpected had occurred in the British lines. The British officers of all ranks were seen to rush to the center of their army, they not being over 300 yards from our lines. The colonel said he was fully convinced from the movements of the officers and the apathy afterward in the attack that Gen. Packenham was certainly killed at that time and that he was shot by one of our unerring marksmen. In fact he stated that he afterwards learned from some British soldiers, who were pulled off the breastwork by our men, that the commotion in their lines was produced by Gen. Packenham's death. If that was so, and Col. McCutchen says there could not be a doubt of it, Gen. Packenham was killed at least 250 yards from our line of works, and consequently could not have been killed in a hand-to-hand encounter by "Lafitte, the pirate," as stated by "Secretario." The truth is, Lafitte was stationed to the left of Col. McCutchen's position, and Packenham was killed immediately in front of Col. McCutchen's line of sharpshooters. Our own hero stated that the ditch in his front was so full of dead soldiers that the attacking column had no difficulty in crossing over as they lay as thick on the ground as one ever saw stones on a very stony field. I asked him if many of the British got on the breastworks. He replied, only a few, and they were immediately killed or jerked over the cotton bales and made prisoner of war. During the lull in the battle spoken of above one of the Col. McCutchen's best riflemen begged him to let him shoot a soldier straggling across the ditch, as no officers were in sight. Col. McCutchen said: "I looked on and saw that the soldier had a beautiful canteen and that it was particularly bright and attractive. I said:

"Yes, you may shoot him, but shoot him through his canteen." The rifleman raised his gun and took deliberate aim, and at the crack of his piece his game tumbled over dead. After the battle the soldier asked Col. McCutchen to let him go over and see "where he shot that blasted Britisher." Says he went, and in a few moments returned with the canteen, having sent a ball directly through it and consequently through the heart of its unfortunate owner. On the canteen was painted this interesting yet wicked couplet:

"William Wily is my name,
And old England is my nation;
To whip the d—d Yankees
And take New Orleans is our destination."

Then followed several other crude rhymes of similar import—something about "Beauty and Booty"—but they were so broken up by the passage of the ball as to be almost entirely unintelligible. While I am thus repeating this interesting reminiscence from the lips of a living participant in the battle of New Orleans, I crave your pardon and space to repeat a few others learned from the same source.

Just before the battle commenced Col. McCutchen said he was walking over to his right and near the levee, when he saw Gen. Jackson ride up under considerable excitement and order an officer to furnish an orderly sergeant and 34 men to report immediately, and armed with pick-axes and shovels. Being a very unusual proceeding, Col. McC. said he followed on to see what "Old Hickory" was going to do; says he stopped near the levee, under a little tree, and thus addressed these men, says he distinctly heard him say: "Men, if we are driven from those breastworks" (pointing at them with his sword, then raising up in his stirrups, the old man said fiercely), "which God forbid—but if we are, do you cut this levee, and drown the whole British army." Then the men mounted the levee and commenced to cut it away, and did cut it within three or four inches of the water for a space of 75 yards or more. Col. McC shrugged his shoulders and said: "Several times during the battle I became uneasy and looked in the direction of that sergeant and his men, fearful they would cut the levee and let in the Mississippi river and drown us, too; but, sir, they stood like a stone wall, dark and immovable, and I felt reassured." Col. McCutchen ended by saying: "I dared not tell my officers or men for fear of a panic; but I tell you, in 10 minutes after we were driven away from those works the whole British army would have been drowned."

Going to Pay the Debt.

A Missouri paper tells of a farmer who owed one Walt Perkins $25, and had owed him for years. One day he met Walt and said:

"Don't be uneasy, Walt, I have the thing all fixed by which I can pay you." Walt asked him how he had got it fixed, and the old granger said: "Well, Walt, if nothing happens, next year I hope to raise a good crop of corn, and I intend to trade some of the corn for a yoke of oxen, and I know an old man in St. Charles county that owns an old mare, and he wants to trade her for a yoke of oxen. Now, Walt, when I raise the corn and get the oxen, I will make the trade for the old mare, and then I will bring her home and raise mule colts—and, Walt, the very first mule colt I sell, you shall have the money."

TUTT'S
EXPECTORANT

Is composed of Herbal and Mucilaginous products, which permeate the substance of the Lungs, expectorates the acrid matter that collects in the Bronchial Tubes, and forms a soothing coating, which relieves the irritation that causes the cough. It cleanses the lungs of all impurities, strengthens them when enfeebled by disease, invigorates the circulation of the blood, and braces the nervous system. Slight colds often end in consumption. It is dangerous to neglect them. Apply the remedy promptly. A test of twenty years warrants the assertion that no remedy has ever been found that is as prompt in its effects as TUTT'S EXPECTORANT. A single dose raises the phlegm, subdues inflammation, and its use speedily cures the most obstinate cough. A pleasant cordial, children take it readily. For Croup it is invaluable and should be in every family. In 25c. and $1 Bottles.

THE GOLDEN ROD.

And were I to be a bride of morn,
While the chimes rung out, I'd say:
"No roses red but the golden rod,
Strew in my path to-day;
And let it brighten the silent aisle,
And flame on the altar stair,
Till the glory and light of the fields shall flood
The solemn dimness there."

And should I sleep in my shroud at eve,
Not lilies pale and cold,
But the purple asters of the wood,
Within my hand I'd hold;
For the golden rod is the flower of love,
That time and change defies;
And asters gleam through the autumn air
With the hues of Paradise!

DEACON SAVEALL'S SPEECH.

On the occasion of a meeting called by the district to consider the question whether a new school-house should be built or not. He takes the opportunity of giving his ideas upon a variety of subjects, including the minister.

From Harper's Bazaar.

MY FRIENDS,—We air here to-night to see if the deestrict will vote to build a new skool-house or not. We air here at no small expense of time, trouble, and kerrseen. I didn't expect to say nothin' when I kum in here, but I've been a-thinkin' as I've been a-settin' that I ought to raise my voice agin the whole purceedin', it is such an extravagant waste of public money taxed out of private indervidooals. I shall vote agin it, and do all I can to kill it. The trouble is, folks want too much in these days, and them folks what have little or nothin' 'cept young ones are always ready to vote to spend other folks' money to edicate 'em. There wasn't much money spent to edicate me, and I've been a deekin in our meetin' for nigh forty year. I've worn the same coat and the same trousers, to say nothin' of waistcoat and boots, every Sabbath-day durin' full half that long period. Ain't I a pattern for the deestrict in matters of ekonomy? What would have bekume of me and Betsy Ann if I hadn't a done so?

I don't purtend to be a judge of wimmin's goods and fixin's, but I've obsarved that she don't spend much of my money on dresses and bunnits. She knows my sentiments too well on them pints, and don't waste her time a-gaddin' round to see the fashuns and such. She's a stay-at-home woman and a workin' woman, she is, and, if I do say it, she's a pattern just as much as I am. Why, it e'en most took our breth away one Sunday mornin' when we seed our minister's wife a-kummin' inter the meetin'-house with a new bunnit on, all kuvered up with flowers and fethers. Sumbody sed 'twas an Easter, or a Wester, I've forgot which, for we don't keep them pagin days like the 'Piscopals and Romans. We know better. We rej'ice in the lite while they walk on in darkness; but as I was a-sayin', me and Betsey Ann was dredfully distrest over it. And when she got hum, sez she to me, sez she: "What an example to our young folks! You oughter to go right over there, Jeremiah, and labor with 'em about it."

The next mornin' I went over to the parsonage, and kerried some specked apples that we wuz goin' to throw away; for I alwuz takes somethin' with me when I goes to see the minister's family—it's a sakred dooty. I tackled Mr. Nicodemus about it. He said that the bunnit was a present from somebody who wuz here last summer. I suppose it wuz some of them city folks who wuz a-doin' nothin,' and spendin' their money at the tavern—"Summerin'," I believe they call it. Anyhow I felt an inward call to labor with the minister a spell longer, and to tell him in plain words that he mustn't allow any of his family to indulge in extravagance, whether it costs him anything or not. We pay him four hundred dollars a year, when we can raise it—that's what he wuz called on—and I've often laid awake nights thinkin' he must be a-layin' up money, and its wrong for ministers to dothat; the Scripters is all agin it.

He has a wife, seven children, and an old uncle on his hands, to be sure, but then we only charge him fifty dollars a year for the use of the parsonage, and there ain't many folks that gets their rent as cheap as that. We use it to pay the insurance, and keep the house in repair. Potatoes and brown bread are cheap; that's our livin' mainly; and what's good enuf for us is good enuf for anybody. And then, agin, I don't see why the minister should be obleeged to entertain the whole tribe of Gadites, and half the tribe of Manassar, and spend our money in feedin' 'em.

Why, it's wus than a flock of Egyptian locusts to see the folks that go a-trampin' in and out of our parsonage in the course of a year. We don't hev any kumpany. We did hev a man and a woman lit down on us onst, but they didn't stay long. She sed that her mother was a third cousin to my wife's great-aunt, but we never seed 'em afore they came a-drivin' into our door-yard. I was a-splittin' kindlings, and Betsey Ann she was a-settin' milk pans out to dry in the sun, when we heerd somebody cry out: "Why, how do you do, Cousin Jeremiah? How do you do, Cousin Betsey." We thot sumthin' was a-kummin,' and when that air woman jumped out of the wagin, and told the man who druv the team to take out the trunks and bandboxes, I riz right up and told 'em we had no kommodations for kumpany, and they'd better go on to the tavern. My punkins! how that female did splutter! They had traps enuf with them to stay a munth; but it was rite in haying-time, and they didn't find the atmosfear congenial, so they left in a hurry, and we've never seed 'em sihce.

"Well, as I was a sayin,' I wrastled and remonstrated with Mr. Nicedemus, and told him that folks was a-talkin' about him and Mis' Nicodemus having too much kumpany. He looked rather cut up, and sed that that the Scripters taught us to entertain strangers and to show hospertility. I surmised that he had heerd sumthin' about the strangers who had lit on us, and how we got rid of 'em; and I made up my mind that if he was a-goin' to put me in that way, I'd tell Mr. Starvemout, when he kums round for my subscription of ten dollars for next year, that I should cut it down one-half. I don't mean to keep a public-house for nothin', and I ain't a-goin' to have the minister spend any of my money in doin' it nuther.

These 'ere ministers have got to be kept down, or they'll get high-minded. They are the sarvents of the people, and I for one think they ought to be reminded of it from time to time. Human natur' is very frail, even in the best on us, and although our Mr. Nicodemus is 'most always a subdued sort of man, we mustn't let him get too independent. P'r'aps sumbody may think that I'm sayin' too much about the minister and too little about the skoolhouse, but I ain't forgot my subject by no means.

Just because Square Jones—who has been travellin' this fall, and has seed a whole lot of new things in the way of edication—thinks that the deestriot oughter hev a new skool-house, the whole naburhood has got crazy over it. I don't know as I can purvent it, but I am a-goin' to raise my voice and use my influence agin it. I've been a deekin nigh on to forty year, and I've passed through more seens and unseens than anybody else in the kummunity.

These 'ere new-fangled notions that Square Jones has been a-talking about—such as skools, skool-buks, and implements—oughter be put down. The only implements we need are agricultooral implements, and as for skool-buks, the old ones are good enuf. Talk about advanced idees, objek-teaching, and new methods! it's all a contrived plan to take the money out of our pockets. Mebbe you don't know how savin' I em about things. Let me relate an insident, which, although it failed of its purpus, my will was all rite.

Last fall sum time, I heerd old Mis' Jones say that Mis' Brown told her darter Melindy that Gloryanna Perkins said that the last time she went down to the city to put some money in the bank that she'd had left her, who should walk in but our Mr. Nichodemus! (The idea of a minister's having anything to do with a bank! I guess the 'possel Paul never went into a bank, and didn't know much about such institootions.) He went up to the cashier with a piece of paper, and he paid him some money. Miss Perkins see the bills, but couldn't tell how much he got, although she tried to; but she heerd the cashier say, "We always like to cash Mr. Duncan's checks; he knows how to do good with his money."

Now Mr. Duncan's folks wuz here in our village all last summer, and went to our meetin', and I noticed that Mr. Nicodemus alwuz paid 'em a good deal of attention—mor'n he oughter, I thought. We hire him to look after our spiritool interests, and not them of rich folks who don't live here.

Puttin' this and that together, it 'curred to me that 'twould pay to go down to the city, see Mr. Duncan, and find out how much that check wuz, so that we could take it out of the salary. I mentioned the matter to a few of our members, and they thought well of it. So after I'd got through gettin' in the sowin' I went down to the city, and after a good deal of trouble I found out where Mr. Duncan's store wuz. So I went in, and sez I to a dapper-lookin' feller who stood behind the counter, "Is Mr. Duncan in?"

"Yes," sez he; "he's in the offis, and is very busy, as this is shippin' day." I didn't see no ships round nowhere, and I thought he meant to chaff me a little, seens as I wuz from what they call the rooral deestricts; so sez I: "Young man, don't you insult me, a man old enuf to be your grandfather. You just tell me where that offis is, for I've got important bizness on hand." He larfed right out, and then pinted me to a glass door, which I opened, and there was Mr. Duncan settin' by a desk 'ritin'. He looked up, and sez he, what can I do for you, my friend?" Sez I, "Didn't you have your fumerly down to our village of Slowtown last summer? and didn't sum of your folks go to our meetin'?" He thot aminit, and then sed, "Yes—what of it?" Sez I, "Didn't you make our minister a present? and if so, how much was it?" I never seed a man get so mad in a minit as he did. "You pryin' old scoundrel," sez he. (I'm most ashamed to use his language, only I want the deestrict to know how much abused I've been for tryin' to save our folks in payin' the minister.)

"Leave this room," sez he. "You don't deserve to have a minister, or to enjoy this blessing of the Gospel. You remind me of the man whose yearly contribution was a peck of green peas." I didn't stay long after that, 'cause it kinder seemed as if my kumpany wasn't appreciated. When I got hum, I told the committy of the way I was received, and they agreed to pay my expenses out of the salary, and deduct twenty-five dollars that year. I thot we'd better take out fifty dollars, and risk it; but Deekin Cautious said that the minister might say sumthin' about it, and make a fuss. So we didn't do it. I haven't passed through such an experience since the time when we painted the outside of our old meeting-house, twenty-five years ago, and tuk it out of old Mr. Hardtimes, who used to do the preaching afore Mr. Nicodemus was hired. There was a good meny then who said I was mean about it, but we must expect to be ill-treated when we make such sacrifices for the sake of religion. I could say more, but won't now, 'cept that I shall continue to raise my voice agin having a new skool-house built in this deestrict; ourn's good enuf.

What a Jilting Did.

The student of history soon learns to say with Dr. Young,

"Think naught a trifle, though it small appear;
Small sands the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles the life."

The British system of artificial inland navigation, which includes one hundred and ten lines and two thousand four hundred miles of canal, sprung from a trifle—a matrimonial disappointment. The Duke of Bridgewater, the originator of the system, was engaged to be married just after he had attained his majority. A dispute arising between the gentleman and lady, the match was broken off.

The duke's chagrin changed the course of his life. He gave his first and last ball to the London world of fashion, and then buried himself among his coal-fields at Worsley. Eschewing the society of women, he even refused to employ them as servants in his manor-house. Disappointed in marrying the most beautiful woman in England, he determined to unite, by means of a canal, his coal-fields with Manchester, then beginning its career as a manufacturing town.

In those days good roads were the exceptions, bad roads the rule. The cottons of Manchester and the woolens of Leeds were conveyed from place to place on pack-horses, which jagged along in single file.

The freight charge from Leeds to London was sixty-three dollars a ton. When the duke's canal was finished, the prices of coal and other commodities in Manchester fell one-half.

The success of this canal started the duke to build one which would connect Manchester with Liverpool. To procure the funds he reduced his personal expenses to four hundred pounds a year. So straightened was he at times that the London bankers hesitated to discount his note for five hundred pounds.

Sometimes when "hard up," he would start his steward upon a collecting tour among the tenantry of the ducal estates. The steward would ride from tenant to tenant, getting five pounds here and ten pounds there. When he had collected money enough, he would return and pay the canal laborers their weekly wages. In a few years, however, the duke's canals paid him on an annual revenue of eighty thousand pounds.

Doubtless England would have had its canals if the beautiful duchess of Hamilton had not jilted the young duke of Bridgewater. But the historical student, who finds that many similar tribes have changed the course of history, will sympathize with Hamlet's words:

"There are more things in heaven and earth,
Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

A Trial in the Open Air.

Ellen F. Mesly in the Springfield Republican.

It was once my fortune most unintentionally to become the witness of a negro trial which I shall always remember. The cause of dispute was a very common one with this susceptible race—the claims of two rival wives to the affections and companionship of a certain—or perhaps I should say an uncertain—young mulatto, named Eben Johnson, and esteemed highly for his good looks and swaggering manner. Eben had married, when very young, a negro woman black as ebony, called Dolshy Strother. They had lived together in great contentment and harmony, to which Dolshy's flaky pastry and fried chickens probably conduced as much as sentiment, until the appearance on the scene of a young mulatto girl Sarah Williams, who with her light complexion, "fine lady" airs, and sneers at Dolshy's color, and want of style, finally succeeded in weaning Eben from her. He had even of late openly avowed his intention of living with her as his wife, and even put it into effect. Dolshy, wounded, insulted and deserted, her heart full of passionate jealousy and wrath as only those of her own race could know, appealed to the church, and the elders and deacons had appointed a time to hear the case, and decide as to her rights.

The place had been chosen with singular appropriateness. It was a deep hollow between two hills where the trees grew thinly, and the sunlight fell freely. The rustling of the dead leaves and the sighing of the winds went on as an undertone or an accompaniment, with the voices of those speaking and the groups of the friends of the different parties, the leading members of the church and the witnesses were arranged in a kind of semi-circle around the two women. In front there was a glimpse of a wide landscape where the far-off mountains and the shining waves of the "unreturning river" gave a certain sense of solemnity to the scene. I was riding by on horse back when the voices arrested my attention, and one of the oldest deacons, Richard Green, a former slave to my father's, seeing that I had halted my horse on the outskirts, and was listening with interest, came up to me after a whispered consultation with his brethren, and with a low bow invited me to witness the proceedings.

"We would be glad, sir, and honored," added the second deacon—He was a colored politician of much influence who prided himself upon his fine language—"to think that a gentleman of your distinguished mediocrity and voracity beheld our poor endeavors to reminister justice," and with a deferential air that quite disarmed any suspicion which might have been aroused by the peculiar nature of his compliments, he lead me to a prominent seat in the assembly, a little apart from the rest.

I knew Dolshy very well, as she had cooked for my sister, and had often been struck by the remarkable sweetness and softness of her voice, and its contrast with her coarse physique, irregular features and black skin. In every other respect she seemed only a good humored, healthy negro, lazy and careless, but as happy as the day was long. Yet when she began to speak or sing—with a voice as clear as that of a wood thrush, and with all of its liquid sweetness, and with a human quality besides so pathetic and touching as if inherited from long generations of those who had known the weariness and darkness of bondage and been "acquainted with grief,"—you would feel the sudden tears start, and only a look at her round, black face, usually in a broad grin, would bring you back to a realization of practical things.

Dolshy's remarks were not generally at all pathetic in their character. Indeed, I think she decidedly inclined to the comical view of human nature. One day some of the "po whites," as she termed them, passed in full view of our kitchen on their way to a "protracted meeting" at the nearest Baptist church, and I heard Dolshy soliloquizing:—

"Jes look at dem folks yonder! Did yo' eber see such narrow chile? En' dressed in yellow, jes' like her ha'ar. Spec day want fer tu match de sample all de way fro!"

I could not see her face now, for while Sarah Williams looked freely from one side of the audience to the other, rustling the feathers and flowers on her hat with every turn of her head, and moving the silver bangles on her arm, Dolshy dressed in an old calico, with a faded shawl over her head, sat in a half-crouching attitude, moaning low to herself.

Eben Johnson sat between them in an indifferent and rather impartial attitude which appeared to me strictly characteristic of the man, for he had rather allowed himself to be captured by this modern Delilah after a sleepy fashion than take any active part in the love-making.

Sarah Williams was speaking as I took my seat. "Now you see dat Brer Eben acted of his own free will in dis matter, au' if he prefer me—which he seem ter do"— with a toss of her head which made her earings glitter in the light—"I karn't prevent his discrimination. Not but I 'scuse Sister Dolshy for her feelin' in de case, fur she ain't had no oder admirers. She is of an unfortunate complexion, an' ain't had no opportunities, sech as I enjoyed, of learnin' style an' ways of living, sech as we seed among de fust folks in town."

Dolshy threw back her shawl and lifted her tear-stained face with a certain pride. "Den ef I is ugly en' 'spised, seems dat de mo' reason why de good Lord 'membered me, en' give me de one thing I kear mos' about, en' de less I has ter kear fur, en' ter pamper in myself, de mo' time I has fur ter be pleased wid my husband and 'sider what he likes. En, de mo' heart I has ter give him in 'versity 'en hard times, in sickness en' health."

Dolshy's tones, with their tender humility of pleading, addressed secretly to Eben, moved all the audience with a strange agitation, but Sarah Williams only greeted her speech with a scornful titter.

"I didn' kno' dat a man eber value a woman mo' 'cause she ain't sought arter. Dat mighty encouragin' fur de ugly ones, en' some ain't neber fur to find!" with a look toward the audience as if to challenge their admiration.

But she had overstepped the line of sympathy, and although the mulattoes in the audience were silent, the negroes, who were black like Dolshy, broke out into open murmurs of indignation. The deacon arose with displeasure in his face.

"I ain't gwine hear no flexions cast on any one fur nat'ral infirmities. It seem, howebber, bred'ren, dat dere ain't no way save fur Eben Johnson ter make his choice, an' may be de Lord lead him aright! Does he bred'ren concur wid me?"

The other deacons agreed.

"Wid de 'spress proviso," added the politician, "dat dis 'cision be a finalone, an' dat the marriage take place afterwards, 'cording to all de forms ob de law."

Sarah Williams arose with an airy gesture.

"His choice is been made, an' dere needn' be no mo' said on dis subjec.' We're much obliged to dis 'sembly fur deir kindness."

I thought beneath all her lightness there was a covert anxiety as to the result, and an evident desire to take Eben away, but Dolshy suddenly cried, "O' no, no!" and extended her hands in a passionate appeal to her husband.

"I don' wan' ter try yo' patience too fur, bred'ren an' sisters, but I wan' ter call ter his 'membrance de ole time when our fus' chile were born. Eben ain't forgot him, he hasn't forgit dat blessed, nor his pretty peart ways"—turning unconsciously toward the woman—the mothers—in the crowd, who answered by tears to her subdued and pathetic tones, and a low moan swept through their midst. "De soun' ob his feet were so sweet, dat in de lonesome hours ob de night, when de rain fall on de roof I woke and' I seem to hear de pitter, patter, pitter patter ob doze lile feet on de flo' De day he died, 'en were laid with his bright eyes shut on de bed de lile restles' feet so still en' de lile flutterin hands folded on his bress' so quiet like; Eben en' I prayed from the bottom ob our hearts to de Lord dat we mightin nebber fall in no kin' o' sin as would shut us from seein dat dear face in heaben!"

She broke down in a long sob; and Eben turned hastily away from Sarah Williams and walked up to Dolshy:—

"Dis woman is my wife, bredren, en wid de blessin' ob de Lord I 'tend ter be true en' faithful ter her her'arter."

The excited audience broke up in tears and sobs, shaking hands and uttering ejaculations, while the old deacon lifted up his trembling hands and voice and sang one of the wild hymns of rejoicing in which his people delight.

Sarah Williams left on the train next day and when I saw Eben and Dolshy they were the happy and contented heads of a large family. The touch of the little hand rested upon them in benediction.

A POLE'S SURE VENGEANCE.

Alexander Semiloff's Dying Confession of an Oath and its Relentless Fulfillment—The Story Confirmed by the Skeleton of One of the Victims.

Reed's Station, Pa., Special to the Philadelphia Times.

Alexander Semiloff, a Pole, aged about thirty-five years, died yesterday at Reed's Station. He had only been here a short time, and was regarded by the countrymen with considerable awe. He came of a noble family, and was an able linguist, speaking fluently, the English, French, Russian and Polish languages, and was a highly educated man. He was very reticent, rarely speaking to any person, and always wore a downcast look, as if haunted by some terrible secret. On Tuesday he was taken ill. A priest and physician were summoned. On being told that he could not live until morning he said he desired to free his mind by making a confession. Two other gentlemen came in afterward, and in the presence of the four he told the following story: "In 1853 I lived with my father in the Polish town of Iltomer, on the Russian frontier. I was then only a child. My mother had died some three years before. We lived in the town quietly until the fall of the year, when my father's sister, a gay handsome young woman whose husband was serving in the Russian army in Turkestan, came to the place to live. By some means she became unduly intimate with a Capt. Romanoff, son of the prefect of the village and captain of a Cossack regiment. At last he betrayed her and induced her to fly from her husband. In a short time she ended her wretched career in Baden Baden, in one of the worst resorts.

"As soon as my father heard of her betrayal he took me upon his knee and made me swear to avenge the wrong by killing off the accursed family. Soon after the prefect was found lying dead by the roadside. My father had killed him and left his pistol lying by his side, so as to give the idea of a suicide, and it was generally thought that the prefect had destroyed himself. Soon my father placed me in an academy at Warsaw, and joining the Russian army in the Crimea followed out his plan of revenge. The betrayer and his brother were officers in the army, and were by some chance assigned to the regiment in which my father served. One night they were found dead in their tents, a knife still sticking in the heart of each. Fearing detection, for it was father who had committed the deed, he deserted the army, and for ten years I saw nothing of him. Occasionally he wrote me from various points, all his letters breathing the same spirit of vengeance. One nigh ne appeared at the university in disguise, and requested me to follow him. Next morning we left for Italy, and in a short time arrived at Milan. From there we went to Florence, where my father said our work of vengeance was to be done. A brother of Romanoff, the prefect, was an attache of the Russian legation at the court of Victor Emanuel, and we determined to slay him.

"For days we followed him, but could never find a chance to safely accomplish our purpose. One night we saw him walking on the river bank, accompanied by another gentleman, and determined to kill him that night. Trusting to the color of our masks, my father sprang at the throat of Romanoff's companion, and, throwing him, held him while I sprang upon Romanoff and stabbed him to the heart twice. Hiding his companion we then threw the dead body into the Arno with the knife still sticking in it. We left his friend lying there helpless and returned to the city. Next morning my father was arrested while sitting in church on a charge of murder. Hearing of it, I escaped to the mountains. My father's disguise had not been perfect, and Romanoff's companion gave such a description of him that he was identified. Shortly after he was tried, convicted and hanged.

I joined a brigade of brigands under the command of Spizzia, who was recently captured in New Orleans, and for sometime a wild life satisfied me. Soon I returned to Poland and found that the Romanoff had been scattered. A number had been exiled to Siberia for treason, while three had gone to America.

"I immediately determined to follow them, and after searching from 1875 to 1881 I found them at this place, but before my vengeance could overtake them two of the three had died from disease, and but one, Albert Loboski, was left. I then secured work there and plotted his destruction. One night he disappeared. Nothing was thought of it, as mysterious disappearances were common among our class. I killed him, and would have gone back to Russia to finish my work had it not been for this sickness."

The listeners were appalled by this story. The man then proceeded to tell in a husky voice the place where he buried the man, and, after receiving the sacrament from the priest, expired, thus escaping the power of the law. This morning a party proceeded to the spot indicated and exhumed the skeleton, with a large, rusty dirk knife protruding from him. There was then no doubt as to the truth of Semiloff's story. A post-mortem examination will be held on the body of Loboski shortly.

Minister West's Romance.

From the Milwaukee Republican.

The story of Mr. West's early and romantic marriage reads so like one of Ouida's society tales that it half seems as though the noble young diplomat and the beautiful heroine must have appeared somewhere in her pages. Twenty years ago, when a stripling attache in the service of the state, this third son of the earl of Delaware married a Spanish actress, a countess in her own right but destined never to receive her dues from Mr. West's family. His mother, the countess of Delaware, was one of the stiff and unrelenting old dowagers that the English novels abound with, and with the severe notions of a worthy British matron, would never hear of her son's misalliance, nor call an actress her daughter-in-law. Notwithstanding this stern and unrelenting parent, Mr. West and his wife continued to be happy, and his ardent and romantic devotion lasted through all the years of her life.

She died in Paris about ten years ago, at the time of the Franco-Prussian war, leaving him three children, to whom he has always been the most indulgent father. The fair lady was famed for her beauty through all the courts of Europe, and her portrait, painted at the king's request, in the Residenz-Palace of Munich, rivals any of the faces in Stielee's Gallery of Beautiful Women. The pure Spanish type of her beauty, and the poetic and exquisite face of the gifted countess, were something rarer than the later and more celebrated charms of Mrs. Cornwallis West. This marriage, regular and legal by all the forms of church and state, was never entered in the peerage, through this unpleasant family difficulty.

A SOCIETY BOSS.

Something About a Man Who is Leading Millionaires by the Nose.

From a New York Letter.

The present society boss is a man named Ward McAllister, who comes from somewhere south. Very little is known about him, except that he lives down about Twenty-second street, in the neighborhood of Sixth avenue, a mile away from the rich and leading element of New York. He is a big, inflated man, with dark, curling hair. He has no known business, and cuts no figure in financial, artistic or professional life. Somewhere about the close of the war he dropped down on New York and proceeded to organize its social barbarians on the first family plan. The first thing he he did was to get up the Patriarchs' ball. There are five of these dancing balls every winter.

McAllister keeps a book and is absolute over it, putting down whom he wishes and leaving off whom he will. About sixty persons are invited to contribute $100 apiece, or $20 per entertainment. Each of these receives five tickets. As the thing has been going on for fifteen years he has considerable hold on our fashionable society, which, however, has never asserted itself for one moment, but lets the imported boss select whom he considers the proper thing. Those who reciprocate by inviting the Mogul to their houses get the invitations.

About two years ago he concluded, as that old generation was thinning out, another scheme must be got up to get in the younger generation, so he organized what is commonly called the F. C. D. C., meaning the Family Circle Dancing Class. It also meets at Delmonico's every fortnight, five times in the season, the subscription price being $100. So, practically, this man, whom nobody knows except in connection with these balls, manages the principal entertainments in New York for ten weeks of the fashionable season—the patriarchs ball coming in between the F. C. D. C. balls.

It is boss government of the most ridiculous sort. McAllister has cut some of the Astors lately and leans toward the Vanderbilts, whom he deftly handles.

Blue Eyes for Beauty.

From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

"To be in the fashion to-day, you must have dark hair, blue eyes, not a particle of color and lips as red as cherry." Thus speaks a prominent writer on the fashions. The artificial production of the black eye is a matter of every day occurrence. The best of friends occasionally do a little of this kind of tinting for one another, but from black or dark brown, or gray, or hazel or green to blue, is a horse, that is to say an eye, of another color, and at this stage of the new era in beauty it does almost seem impossible that the ingenuity of man would be able to accomplish the result. Such was the opinion of D. A. D. Williams, an oculist, to whom the subject was broached this morning by a Post-Dispatch reporter.

"There is no art by which the color of the iris can be changed," said Dr. Williams. "The iris consists of a curtain which is on the inside of the eye and the back part of which is supplied with a pigment which varies in color, as we see daily, and is in characteristic harmony with the hair and complexion of the owner. The only change which can be effected in the appearance of the eye is accomplished by the use of belladonna. Ladies who have light eyes, which they wish to darken, drop into them a solution of belladonna, which has the effect of largely dilating the pupil. The light color of the iris is thus displaced by the deep black of the pupil and the appearance of the eye is greatly changed. Many ladies practice this habit, which is not harmful, although it causes considerable discomfort. After a lady has given her eyes a dose of a belladonna, its immediate action is to dilate the pupils and they remain so, no matter how intense the light may be. Thus you see the ballroom beauty who has increased her charms in this way suffers considerably, her eyes admitting such a quantity of brilliant light as frequently to render her almost blind for the time being."

"How long does this unnatural dilation last?"

"Generally about a week. Where a very weak solution has been employed it will pass away in a couple of days. Very few ladies however, who employ belladonna, use the weaker solution."

"But very blue eyes are positively unattainable?"

"Yes, sir. There is no process by which the natural color of the iris can be changed. The pigment cannot be reached in any way that is now known to science."

"Could not the ladies wear blue eyes over their brown ones?"

"Yes, they could—in a story, not otherwise. A healthy eye would not allow of the wearing of a false one over it. There would not be room for it. The artificial eye can only be placed over one which has been shrunken by disease. No; there is no way by which the color of the eye can be changed, none whatever."

The Stomach.

The stomach is the best friend of man, but he uses it as if it was his worst enemy.

It is supposed to hold about three pints, but if a man can't put four quarts in it he feels disappointed and "hungry."

When a man gets hold of anything he don't know what to do with he puts it in his stomach and takes all the risks. And he never learns any better, though he suffers the torments of the unblest ever after.

It is generally considered that the stomach is a hopper into which anything can be thrown, with the assurance that the digestive machinery will take care of it. This is not so. Fried shingle nails and fricaseed hair pins will not assimilate with he human system any easier than leathery flap jacks of lobster salad and milk.

It is erroneous to suppose that when the stomach is packed with solid food of seventeen different varieties it is capable of holding several quarts of different sorts of liquid. It will fail to make a comfortable feeling swill tub of itself.

"The older a stomach grows the tougher it is," is an error. A ten-year old stomach will get away with green apples and peanuts, shells and all, while a forty-year old stomach will simply get away with itself and all that's in it.

It is useless to attempt to pave the inside of the stomach with conglomerate. Nothing but the best Belgian pavement should be used and that should be thoroughly masticated. You can eat Belgian just as safely as you can eat a thousand things that you do eat.

In making a beer vat of your stomach, under the impression that you will thus become a walking brewery, you will find out your mistake. You will merely put on a bay window which will be expensive to live up to.

A sea voyage is an excellent revelation of the capacity of the stomach. There is no danger of losing it altogether in the process, though you frequently feel the fastenings break. A few hours on land will bring it to its "hungry."

The first thing a man does when his stomach feels bad is to put some medicine in it to make it feel worse. He is looking about for the happy contrast when it will possibly feel better.

The more medicine a man puts into his stomach the more that organ seems to crave, and the more money the patent medicine man gets to circulate his ill-looking portrait in the newspapers.

Occasionally a stomach is obliged to go empty. If those who overfeed themselves were obliged to fill these empty stomachs with the surplus they eat and don't need there would be no starvation in these parts.

Don't mistake your stomach for a receptacle of everything that tastes good, but use it rationally, treat it to gentle doses of strength giving, nutritious food, moderate quantities of mild drink, exhilarating exercise, a little fresh air occasionally, and you will reach that happy elevation of good health and spirits which will render you totally oblivious of the fact that you have a stomach at all. A man who is thoroughly aware of the presence of his stomach is not well.

SCHOOL SCENE.

The people of Central America are noted for their politeness. It is universal. The very idlers of the street never pass a lady without removing their hats, and no servant goes to bed without wishing her employers good night. Dr. F. C. Valentine, a physician of New York, who spent some time in Central America with his family, tells us (in The Manhattan) why this is so. He says, "the prime study, and the only one in which all students are invariably perfect, in all schools, is the Class of Urbanity and Good-Manners. It occupies the first place in the curriculum of all institutions of learning, except in the schools of medicine and law.

"The text-book used is called 'Carreno's Manual of Urbanity and Good-Manners,' and the author has prepared a compendium of his work for the use of schools of both sexes. Let us suppose this study transferred to one of our North American schools. Adopting the Central American form of address, the teacher would say,—

"Young ladies and gentlemen of the class of politeness will please to arise."

"They arise and bow to their teacher and to each other.

"Master Chester Smith, you will kindly permit me to remark that your bow is not quite as low or as dignified as should be that of an hidalgo of the old school. Would you oblige me by repeating it?"

"Master Chester smiles affably, places his right hand where he presumes his heart to be and gracefully swings his left, while his entire body describes a curve. "That is better, Master Chester; I thank you." To which the pupil replies, with an other and more extensive bow and sweep, "I am in a delirious frenzy of acute delight at having pleased my most amiable teacher."

"The teacher says, "Ladies and gentlemen of the Class of Urbanity and Good-Manners will kindly oblige me by taking their seats."

The class responds, "Our high esteem for our teacher positively forbids our being seated until our learned Professor occupies the chair of wisdom and amiability."

"But ladies and gentlemen, I beg o you"—

"'Our beloved teacher, we humbly beseech your mercy'—

"Each phrase is accompanied by a bow, and the teacher finally, with a deprecatory and apologetic courtesy, assumes the chair.

"The scholars bow to each other and go through a pantomime, as each one endeavors to insist that his or her neighbor shall sit first.

"Let us presume ourselves to be the committee appointed to examine the class which is about to graduate, and that, like all Central Americans, we have memorized Carreno from cover to cover. We respond to the teacher's inviting bow and proceed to question the graduates, just as such committees would do in Central America.

"'Master Benjamin Butlero, please to tell us, if you kindly will, how does our Master Carreno divide man's moral duties?'

"Master Benjamin arises, steps forward and bows, first to us, to his teacher and then to his classmates. He strikes an oratorical attitude, and says, 'The moral duties of man are divided into the duties we owe to God, to society and to ourselves. Our duties to society are divided into those we owe to our parents, our country and our fellow-beings."

"Master Grover Partatierra, will you please to tell us how urbanity is divided?"

"Into chapter the first, geneal principles; chapter the second, cleanliness in our persons, our clothing, our house and toward each other; chapter the third treats how we should deport ourselves at home, which is again divided into "method" as a part of good education, retiring and arising, home-garments, our conduct toward our family, and toward our neighbors, the fourth chapter, how to behave in the streets, in church and at school.

"The fifth is a social one, and from it we have learned how to conduct conversations, how to make visits, how to behave at table, how to carve and serve food, and how the deportment should be while gambling. The sixth and last chapter show the differect applications of urbanity in epistolary correspondence, and concludes with divers rules."

"Miss Susana Liliana, would you oblige us by detailing the rules we are to observe when we do not know how to proceed?"

"In society, whenever we do not know the manner of proceeding in certain cases, we follow the example set us by the most cultured persons present, as is directed by Senor Carreno, on page thirty-two and paragraph eleven."

"Miss Maria Andadera, would you please to tell how a man who acts womanly and a woman who acts manly appear?"

"The second part of Carreno, nineteenth chapter, on page thirty-five, says that a man who adopts woman's moderation appears timid and weak, while a woman who assumes man's free deportment appears immodest and coarse."

"As we continue the examiner we discover, in grief, a number of interesting matters, and find that the students invariably cite the page, chapter and article, paragraph and line, as evidence that they have Carreno 'by heart.'"

War Stories.

Washington Cor. N. Y. Times.

I held down a chair in a party a few evenings since in which Colonel Hatch, of Hannibal, Mo., who served in the rebel army, and some ex-Union soldiers were relating war stories. The colonel, who is now a member of congress, told many a good yarn, but none that interested me more than some of the gloomy days of the Confederacy during the winter of 1863-4. He said they had by some means gotten hold of a bundle of Chicago papers, in one of which they found a paragraph saying that some of the farmers on the great prairies of Illinois had been forced to burn corn for fuel, on account of its cheapness and the high price of coal. He said the paragraph had more interest for them at that time than all the other contents of the papers, and it was generally shown about and discussed through the camp. "I remember," said the colonel, "how sombody said: 'What's the use of fighting a people who are burning corn for fuel, while we are counting it out by the grain?' and we pretty near all agreed with him."

"Well," said one of the Union men, "I remember when we took one of your men prisoners at Chancellorsville, and they told us they hadn't had anything to eat for two days, we thought, 'What's the use of fighting men who can fight like this without eating anything?'"

Wages in Russia.

A correspondent of the London Times, writing from the "black lands" of Russia about the scarcity of labor in that region, says that the laborer's ordinary wages are from forty to fifty copecks (twenty-five to thirty cents) daily; but at harvest time, or when the field is to be dug for beet root, the landlord finds it extremely difficult to procure laborers even at two or three rubles a day, and he declares he would rather pay that high wages to one efficient laborer than to four such lazy hounds as he can muster in the neighborhood. Of the northern peasants, reported to be yearly flocking from their comparatively barren lands to these fertile southern fields, hardly any make their appearance, except carpenters and other mechanics, who, however useful in their several capacities, are of no avail whatever as field hands. The distress for reapers and plowmen have waxed so great that the government has had to come to the the landowner's rescue by allowing the soldiers quartered in the garrisons to lend their hands at the rate of one ruble daily for each man, their employer having to feast and entertain the officers in the bargain. But, although as many as 50,000 men from the ranks have been told off in the province of Podolia alone to make themselves useful on a better ground than the battlefield, the supply of labor is still wholly inadequate to the demand.

THE PHOTOGRAPHER'S TRIAL.

Behavior of Humans and Brutes Before the Cameras.

From the New York Tribune.

"I should think you would meet with some amusing incidents in your business," said a Tribune reporter to a photographer the other day.

"Yes, I do. I sometimes run in the dark room to have a good laugh all to myself. It wouldn't do to laugh before the people, you know."

"Queer cases? Why, there's one in the other room now. That woman has been here since 10 o'clock with that little child. I have taken ten pictures of it, and spoiled sixteen plates. Why, I worked hard till 1 o'clock, and then I told her I must have something to eat. She wanted to get a good expression on the child. Now, when a baby is bobbing around or 'goo-gooing' or crying, I have to take them 'on the fly,' or whenever I can, I can't stop to 'get an expression on them.' I have made all manner of noises and grimaces, and make a perfect fool out of myself to attract their attention and make them sit still. When everything else fails, I light some paper. I have burned up many a newspaper, and wonder I haven't burned the shop up. But they will watch a fire a little while."

"A good many country people come here, I should suppose?"

"Yes; in fact, that's the main source of our trade. We are near the ferries, and so get a good many New Jersey people. Once in a while I have a countryman who has never been photographed. He will want to know if his ears are all right or if his hair is in disorder, and he seem to care more about getting his clothers in the picture than his face. When everything is ready and I take this pole with the picture for him to fix his eyes on, put it in its proper place, and say, 'Look at this,' I'm blamed if he won't get up and inspect it, and I have to pose him all over again.

"One wishes to know all about the iron prop that steadies his head. Everything seems so mysterious to him. 'Will I have to sit still fifteen minutes?' he will ask. 'Oh! no,' I say, 'about fifteen seconds.' Then when done he will say, 'Oh, you did make me sit still full ten minutes.'

"A young fellow about 16 came here once who seem afraid of the machine. I would tell him where to fix his eyes, but as soon as I turned to the camera he would be looking with a scared expression. I made a picture of him at last, and he was overjoyed. He really seemed to imagine it was going to hurt him. Negroes generally take well. One nice thing about them is that they will never tell you to do this way or that, but merely say, 'Make me a picture.' We must be careful though, about their noses. They are naturally inclined to turn up and if we don't look out we will magnify them into perfect frights.

"We photograph a good many sailors, and they are the perfect sitter. I can go out of the room after I have posed them and stay half an hour, and they will not stir a muscle or wink an eye while I am gone."

"Do you get a Chinaman often?"

"Not ofen here, though I used to when I worked further up town. A Chinaman sits well after you get him posed, but he is just like a piece of wood. If you try to turn his head a little you have to turn his shoulders and the chair and the whole house, I might say, with him. Chinamen's eyes seem to have no depth of color, and reflect the light so that they just glare in a picture. The only good eyes I ever got from a Chinaman were those of a high-toned fellow who had a good position as steward on a yacht. One day he came wearing some huge blue spectacles. They had glasses on the side of the eyes as well as in front. I told him it would not do, for I expected it would just make two big blotches in the picture. But he said they were part of his costume and must go in. I peeped through the cylinder, and I could not see a vistage of his eyes for a frightful picture. But those eyes took through the blue glass splendidly, and he was so pleased that he ordered a large number of the photographs. I have been thinking since of taking all Chinamen through blue glass.

"One of the prettiest pictures I ever made was that of a negro woman up town. She dressed herself up gorgeously, and painted her face, putting plenty of red on her cheeks. The picture was a little dark, like that of a Cuban, perhaps, but you would never have thought it was of a negro woman. Many people admired it."

"Do you have to photograph animals often?"

"No, and I do not want to, though it is not hard to get a picture of a dog, or even a cat, and horses usually stand well. A man came with a monkey, which he wanted photographed sitting on his hand. The monkey was a little fellow, and he brought him in his pocket. Just as we went to take the cover off the machine the monkey turned like a flash and jumped into the man's pocket."

A VIEW OF THE NILE.

Natural Dams of Floating Grass—The Animals of the Great River.

From Nature.

The country is covered with rich grasses, mostly consisting of such species as grow perfectly well even in water. This grass can be lifted with its roots by water and grows floating on the surface, so as to render it most difficult to draw the line of demarcation between land and water. Mammals and birds leave it during the rainy period, and wander to the hilly tracts, but during the dry season the banks of the maije and of the rivers are peopled with elephants, buffaloes, giraffes, antelopes and many kinds of birds. The people who inhabit this region, the Dinka, the Shilluk, and the Neuer, all belong to a very low level of civilization. Living mostly on their herds of cattle, they change their abode in accordance with the season, but they cannot be considered as true nomads, as the land occupied by each tribe is strictly limited by other tribes, and every encroachment on another's land is punished by war. It is obvious that in this region the fall of the rivers is very small and that the regular overflow of water may be checked by winds and other occasional circumstances; while the great quantities of water poured down into the basin during the rainy season cannot find an easy way through the flat channels. Extensive inundations occur, therefore, every year, and when the rains are especially heavy great masses of floating grass are brought in by the waters of the main river, and accumulate in its windings. New floating islands of grass are brought by to these barriers, being pressed upon or beneath them, and thus the whole of the river throughout its width and depth is obstructed by these barriers, which the inhabitants call setts. When the barrier, which thus forms a true dam across the great river, has not yet reached a great size, it might be occasionally destroyed by the pressure of the water accumulated above it; but as several barriers are formed at the same time at various places, the upper one being destroyed, its debris is brought to the lower one, and accumulates above it, and the tenacity and elasticity of these dams are so great that a steamer attempting to force them is soon repelled by the elasticity of the grass, while men and even cattle can easily stand on the floating grass without danger.

There are 13,000 acres of watermelons in Burke County, Georgia.

SOME AUSTRIAN RAMBLES.

A Moonlight Peep at the Oberitz Forest—Queer Villages That Are Dirtily Picturesque.

A Glimpse at Eggenburg—Its Antique Church and History—Collection of Strange and Interesting Curiosities.

EGGENBURG, Lower Austria, Special Correspondence, June 15.—Lajos is a very clever servant; he has good sense enough to be an American. He left Vienna on the 21st of last month, and, instead of enduring the dust and heat of the day, drove all the way to Seefeld. He spent his days sleeping or visiting acquaintances, and Friday evening last, came along the "Kaiser Koenigliche Hauptstrasse," the impeial royal turnpike, just as Sweet Fern and myelf, with Pym acting as body guard, had reached the wayside cross at he entrance of the village in the noonlight stroll, which the heartfelt utterance, "Would I were a lady's maid," had wrung from my sense of propriety. Moonlight walks being so very immoral, I proposed to Sweet Fern to take an afternoon ramble in the Oberitz Wald and—lose our way, stop at some peasant's hut, purchase our supper—then wander by moonlight back to the castle as late as we pleased. Of course Pym was taken into the secret and ordered to meet us at the village "Cross," about 9 o'clock, but to tell the valet when he came to announce supper, that we had gone to walk and intended to stop at the parsonage, a home so noted for its hospitality that our absence from supper at the castle would not be remarked, and the carriage ent for us would find us on the way home. Everything turned out as delightfully as heart ould wish. The Oberitz forest, part of the ount's hunting ground, is full of wild flowers, rchids and vetch, of most brilliant hue, and he delicous fragrance of grape vines and hedge oses in this May month, made breathing a deght. All the afternoon, accompanied by the orester and one of the huntsmen, we wandered nder tulip and accacia trees, which, combined ith beech, oak and larch, form one f the finest silver and gold pheasnt preserves in Lower Austria. hrough the trees we had charming glimpses f the garden-like plains of Moravia, and in the r distance the blue hills of Bohemia looked ke cloud shadows on silver lakes, the western y seemed like an ocean until the rose purple ght of the dammerung covered it. Then we ent down to the forester's and had goat's ilk, brown bread, radishes, salad, and—yes e did—tiny white onions cut into vinegar and lt.

We left the forest about 8 o'clock. The moon ad not risen; we thought best, however, to get ithin the park before supper was ended; but pon reaching the highway we took the wrong rn and proceeded for half an hour along the oravian road, before we discovered our miske. Retracing our steps, the moon rose from hind the Manchartsburg hills, just as we ached the wayside cross. We sat down on old steps of a small gray stone ruin which ad once been a wayside shrine, but now und, was overgrown with poppies and kornumen, blue starry flowers that seemed silver the rising moon. It was very lovely there the still, quiet night—not a human voice, household light, not a movement or sound break the awful stillness.

AN AUSTRIAN LANDSCAPE.

The dawn of the following day was bright nd breezy, with just enough sunshine to make r early drive to Zellerndorf, fifteen miles istant, delightful. The absence of fences or edges give peculiar charm to the Austrian ndscape. A shallow, grassy ditch separates e fields, and their ownership is known by old, oss grown corner stones bearing the coronet d escutcheon of the family to whom they beng; thus for many miles after leaving Seefeld e saw the coronet and escutcheon of the famy in whose castle we had been residing. We ssed through innumerable dorfern, strangely rty Austrian villages, composed of a long reet and one-story cottages huddled closely gether. They are not in perfectly even line, me extend several feet into the road; sidelks there are none, nor doorsteps. The enance to these houses are large arched or uare doorways through which you enter the urtyard or square around which the house is ilt, and the house door is found in this court nerally facing a compost heap, and few feet from a mudpuddle, where geese, cks and children wade and waddle to their arts' delight. The archways often have the rangest devices painted around and over em: Noah entering the ark, but which is e patriarch and which the baboon is hard to termine; St. George subduing the dragon, d the archangel Michael hovering over a rning lake, his spear poised to drive back e legions of Lucifer.

At Zellerndorf, a very pretty and clean lookg village, one of the chief stations of e Statsbahn, we awaited Pym, who was to me by train with our trunks late in the afteron. Breakfast, more properly lunch, was rved us at an old roadside inn. We ate off a oden table with horn-handled knives and rks, and beer served us in huge mugs, one which sufficed as a day's allowance for Fern d myself.

AN UNKNOWN GRAVE.

While our horses were resting, we hired oth- and drove over the roads winding between e white towers of Zellerndorf and Pulkau—were raised by Elenor, wife of King Ottocar Bohemia, in memory of his death upon the ld of the battle which occurred between the ecks and Magyars in 1276, in the neighborod of these villages. His body was never und, and so, not knowing exactly where to ace a monument, his devoted dow built one at either end of the ttle plain. Austrian dukes, Turks and Poles ce disputed this district with Bohemian kings, d so many battles were fought before the me of the Thirty Years' war that few records them were preserved in the villages, then all settlements of emigrants, chiefly Slaves, ho came with the Ugri from the Caucasus.

We reached Eggenburg about midnight, and und a very cheerful welcome from the Frau irthin, of the village inn. She had excted us for two days; our rooms re in perfect readiness, and a w minutes served to prepare us upper of eingemachtes, a warmed up fricas- of chicken breast and wings. "Railroad cident-ed chicken," Pym calls it ever since e heard of the boarding school boy who rote to his mother to have "chicken that oked like railroad accidents" for his dinner.

AN INTERESTING OLD TOWN.

Eggenburg is built upon a hill and surnded by huge bastions, surmounted by a anite wall, and high above this great circular were rise at a distance of fifty feet from each her. Turks and Protestants have vainly atmpted to mount these walls, for this old hisrical city was as noted in the Thirty Years' r as in the attacks of Magyars and the Ottoans; but not until 1642 were these castled ights taken, and then there was a woman's nd in it—as there generally is in every descable treachery. We saw but little of the n the evening of our arrival, but the pictesque round towers had so fascinated Sweet rn in the moonlight that we arose early the llowing morning to see them, and, following sound of bells, found our way to the church of St. Stephen, built in the elfth century. It is a fine specimen the early period of decorated Gothic; the ceries of the windows are purely geometal with but slight approach to the flamboy- of continental architecture. Internally the ilding was not so pleasing. It was repaired in fourteenth century, and many of the early ural altars were removed. One alone remains, a angely painted triptych, the subjects of which the martyrdom of St. Stephen and the resrection of the daughter of Jairus. Only a w exquisite bits of the old stained glass of church windows are found. These are intly recognizable from their rich hues of rian purple, orange and blue. When the ssites held Eggenburg they garrisoned the urch and chained and locked the entrance to pulpit. This chain and lock are still prerved and are now hanging under the pulpit ey once so effectually closed. On the ght of the chancel choir stands old gothic tower-like pillar; the upper part a grated compartment, which was forrly used for keeping the pyx containing the essed sacrament. Many such pillars were ce found in the old gothic churches of the ntinent, for in earlier days the consecrated fer was not kept in the altar tabernacle as w.

Besides being remarkable in history, Eggenrg is noted for its amethysts. Layers of ese translucent purple stones are found in yellow clay soil on the hillside slopes to east. On our return from church we took short walk beyond the walls of the town in the direction of the amethyst beds, and secured a number of very fine specimens. After breakfast we obtained permission to visit the property of a rich Vienna bourgeoise, and a very uncultured, unæsthetic creature she must be for she has "restored" this superb medieval ruin in the most barbarous manner, converting it, heaven only knows how, into a Swiss cottage. The donjon keep is plastered over and painted to represent blocks of gray marble. It was sickening to behold, and we were glad to escape down to the walk on the bastions below the city, whence we could look up to the great round towers and fortress walls, and down into the green valley of grain and fruit trees on our left. One of these towers had served as a prison in the Thirty Years' War. I looked up to the small iron-barred lancet window which they told us had been that of a prison cell. A white dove sat there among the ferns and grasses, waving in the summer wind.

In the center of the town is a strange house, which cannot fail to attract the attention of tourists. A nephew of the late burgomeister showed us the title deeds and gave us a history of the building. The house, built in the fifteenth century, had been a gift from the Emperor Ferdinand II., in 1626, to his secretary, Hegmuhler. It appears like a building of sculptured stone, but is in reality a stone house covered with mortar, upon which, while wet, scripture pictures and legends have been sculptured. The old German letters are as deeply cut and clear as when made over 300 years ago. They are of a dark brown color, as if sepia had been washed into the incision. We deciphered and translated several of the texts. One of the most prominent was: "The best gifts from God are wisdom and truth: ask and they shall be given unto you."

To-day we have visited

AN AMATEUR ANTIQUARY.

The museum of a young law student, Herr Krahuletz, who has made a very fine collection of the minerals and antiquities found in and near Eggenburg. Urns and vases 2,000 years old, beads and fibula, (long dagger-like pins), with marks that antiquarians pronounce of Celtic origin, arrow-heads of the stone period, and lances of the bronze age, have been dug up in the hillsides and mounds around the town for many years past; these Herr Krahuletz has collected with skeleton hoofs, millstones used in the year 400, and gold ornaments belonging to nations of most remote antiquity, and kindly invites tourists interested in such relics to spend a day at his amateur museum. Skeletons of women with long strands of hair clinging to the mummy-like skin on their heads, and little stone boxes, which, when broken open, showed the skeleton of a child or a cat, for Pym declared children's ribs in these days were not shaped like the queer bones of a tiny infant we saw encircled with brass rings, and about its neck a band of green malachite beads strung on gold, but the amateur antiquary assured us it was "a coffin of the stone age, and the brass of Chaldean workmanship." Sweet Fern suggested that they were Hebrew and made by Tubal Cain, but the young man, thinking she was laughing at him, said he was sure she must be fatigued with her walk, and invited us into the next room, where his mother had a thoroughly German lunch of salami, kaiser schmarn, topfen, apfel strudel and lager bier, which, being translated, would mean a peculiar kind of sausage, emperor's stir-a-bout, cottage cheese, apple pie, and beer. The emperor's favorite dish is in great favor among the bourgeoisie. It is made of stale semmel, soaked in egg and milk, then fried in butter. When well made it is very palatable, but flour-food, the celebrated mahlspeise of the Austrians, is not often liked by Americans. As soon as we have finished sketching the bastions and towers of the fortifications, we are going to visit a chateau whose foundations were laid a thousand years ago, in the reign of Charlemagne, but the drives around Eggenburg are beautiful enough to detain us for weeks, and our Frau Wirthin is a character which repays study.

IMPERIA.

IRISH PAUPERS.

County Kerry Ridding Itself of Its Poor—The Personnel of Recent English Importations of Irish to This Country.

The steamship Furnessia, of the Anchor line, which arrived yesterday from Liverpool, says the New York Times, brought about 300 poor Irish, whose passage to this country had been paid by the British government. These immigrants were subjected to a rigid examination at Castle Garden, and it was ascertained that five heads of families had been inmates of the Kerry county workhouse, while others were without money, and the majority of those who had friends here had not been sent for by them. The assisted immigrants on the Furnessia contrasted very unfavorably with those who came on the same vessel, but had paid their own passage. The former were all warmly clad, but their clothing was, as a rule, not as good as that usually worn by Irish immigrants. There were few able-bodied young men. There were no persons who admitted being over seventy-years of age, but many of the men and women looked infirm. The majority of the assisted immigrants were women and children. There were some single women, but the great majority of the adult females had children with them. Some of the people who were comparatively well dressed stated that their clothing had been given them by the poor guardians just before leaving home. The people stated that they had been supplied with tickets and drafts on Henderson Bros., agents of the Anchor line, by Michael O'Driscoll, the clerk of the board of poor guardians at Cahersiveen, County Kerry. They were sent from there to Valencia, where the steamship Furnessia called and received them on board.

ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN.

Mary Clifford, twenty-five years old, said that she had been in the workhouse six years, during which time she gave birth to two illegitimate children, who are now with her. She has no relatives or friends living in this country. She was given thirty shillings besides her passage ticket. Nano Sullivan, another young woman, said that she had been in the work house three years, and had an illegitimate child, which she brought with her. She was given £1 by the poor guardians. Mary Brennan stated that she had been in the workhouse four years, and that her eldest child, a daughter, had been with her in the workhouse. She brought this child and another younger one to this country. She had been married to a man named Lynch, who was the father of her eldest child, but had died. She was told by Jeremiah Garrivin, the master of the Kerry work house, to apply to Michael O'Driscoll, who gave her a draft for £3 10s. and a passage ticket. She was not supplied with a railway ticket, and she had no relatives and friends in this country. Mary Sullivan said she had been in and out of the work house during the past five years. She has three children with her. A draft on Henderson Brothers for £3 was given to her by the poor guardians. Richard Connor, forty years old, said that he had been in the work house off and on during the past twelve years. He has a friend in Illinois who he hopes will assist him, but he was given only £1 10s to begin life upon in this country. Mrs. Darby Shea, who came with her husband and six children, gave birth during the passage to a child, which only lived a few hours, and was buried at sea. Her husband said that he had friends in Norwich, Conn. Mary Lynch said that she had nephews in Illinois, but had been given a railroad ticket to Norwich, Conn., and £3, which will not take her to her destination. Several of the immigrants had been given tickets to the wrong points, and are without the means of reaching their friends. Some say that they were told that they would be given money at Castle Garden, and that the railroad tickets which had been made out wrong would be made right there also. John Kelly, fifty years old, said that he had been told that he would be sent out to Illinois free of charge. He brought his wife and three children and had a draft for £6 10s. This was about the largest amount for which any one draft had been made out. Catherine Neary had no money whatever. She has a brother in Buffalo, who, however, is not expecting her. Some said that their friends had sent them home money. One man said that a friend here was probably expecting him, although he admitted that no letter had passed between them for two years. The majority of those who claimed that they had friends and relatives in this country admitted that the latter were still in blissful ignorance of their coming. They said that Michael O'Driscoll was being greatly assisted in his work of ridding Kerry of her poor by a relative named John O'Driscoll and generally known as the knight of Kerry.

BY THE WAYSIDE.

An April landscape, flushed with tender green,
A level broken by a broad, clear creek,
A vista 'twixt the maple rows, with streak
Of road that meets the arch; all this is seen
Where three ways meet, and many a farmhouse lies
Within the prospect. Sitting by the way
A crippled child, bent low in innocent play,
Raises a sweet, glad face to my unhappy eyes,
Over the fields light-footed children run
With merry laughter, but this blessed one

A WASHINGTON WEDDING.

Mary Clemmer Ames, the Blushing Bride of a Dude—How the Lucky Quill-Driver Got There.

One of Garfield's Doctors Also Said to Have Been Left—The Tale of a Copper-Toed Shoe.

WASHINGTON, Special Correspondence, June 27.—Weddings have been as plentiful as strawberries this month, and many of the bonny young brides were as blushingly beautiful as the June rose in their rich bloom. Yet the bride who excited the deepest interest in society was one who had passed the blushing period, being "fair, fat and forty," and a widow—"by grace;" while her quiet marriage was lacking in all the external features which go to make up an attractive wedding. No floating veil or orange blossoms; no display of flowers or grand array of wedding gifts, no crowd of curious guests at the altar, nor blockade of carriages in front of the church; but a ceremony so unobtrusive in its simplicity and so quietly performed that very few knew anything about it until it was all over—this was the wedding of Mr. Hudson with Mrs. Mary Clemmer. Fairer brides and younger ones, too, have wedded here, but none more sincerely admired nor more cordially liked than this popular lady, around whose feet fell a greater shower of rice and old slippers—metaphorically speaking—than falls to the lot of most new-made wives. I do not know a woman in Washington who has a wider circle of truer friends than Mrs. Clemmer has had during the years in which she has identified herself with our city. While far from being a "society" woman in the shallow sense in which the term is commonly used, this industrious writer found leisure amid the many claims upon her time and pen, to mingle a good deal in the best society, where she was highly honored and appreciated, both for her intellectual gifts and womanly attractions. I perceive that I am speaking of this famous correspondent in the past tense, which savors somewhat of an obituary notice, as if, indeed, she had gone to "that bourne from whence no traveler returns," instead of having departed on a pleasant bridal tour with the man of her choice. Perhaps it is because, like many who have known her in the zenith of her fame, I have an instinctive feeling that Mrs. Clemmer, the clever correspondent, is really lost to us and that we shall see her no more, though Mrs. Hudson, the contented wife, may be quite as agreeable and welcome in her place. It seems a little like croaking to predict that Mrs. Hudson will drop her old labor as readily as she dropped her old name, yet the prediction is made on all sides that she will write very little, if any, now that she wears the matrimonial yoke, though the similarity of their avocations and the congeniality of their tastes would seem to indicate that these two who have worked so well in single might do better in double harness. However, we shall see what we shall see. In the meantime it is interesting to read the many expressions of hope that "Mrs. Ames Clemmer"—which is putting the cart before the horse—"will be able to resume her more serious and long-neglected literary labors when she returns." As if—good lack!—women had more time after marriage than before to dabble in ink. But if she never writes another line, Mrs. Hudson, nee Clemmer, will doubtless be content, for she is too thoroughly feminine in her nature to value fame more highly than love.

And this match is a love match, although the bride is her husband's senior by at least ten years. The disparity in years need prove no barrier to their happiness, because in talent and mental attainments they are about evenly balanced, Mr. Hudson, however, being less widely known than his accomplished wife.

A BOSTON DUDE.

He is a good journalist and "smart," as the New Englanders say, but he is nevertheless a Boston dude of the most pronounced type—dresses in the extreme of fashion, carries his elbows akimbo a la jug handle mode, and walks with the "picadilly trot" so much affected by swells of the period. He is a brainy dude, if I may be pardoned such a contradictory term, all dudes being popularly supposed to exist without brains. Mr. Hudson was for several years a lodger in Mrs. Clemmer's house, and it was there that the attachment began which afterward ripened into love. Mr. Hudson, finding his landlady a charming and lovable woman—in shining contrast to the Mrs. Macstingers who intimidate men of the Capt. Cuttle and Bunsby types all over the world—did what any well-regulated gentleman lodger would do under the circumstances. He laid siege to her heart. Just at that time, however, he had a competitor for this prize; a certain distinguished physician who visited Mrs. Clemmer after the accident which befell her a few years ago while she was driving with Mrs. Croly (Jennie June) in this city. In healing her injuries the gallant doctor received a heart wound himself, and endeavored to steal his patient's heart by way of consolation. The gossips generally believed the blonde doctor was the favored suitor, but, as is often the case, the gossips were so far-sighted that they saw what existed only in their own imaginations. Mr. Hudson brooked no rivalry and won the prize. To quote the somewhat slangy remark of a brother journalist and admirer of Mr. Hudson's: It's a cold day when a professional sawbones can get ahead of a professional quill driver, whether its a contest over love or malaria. "Mr. Hudson doubtless has enough human nature—or man nature—about him to appreciate his wife all the more highly for knowing that more than one man tried to win her. It was rumored once that Dr. Baxter—he who had the little unpleasantness with Dr. Bliss, during Mr. Garfield's illness, was another suitor of hers before he married; but this idea arose, no doubt, from Mrs. Clemmer's close association with Dr. Baxter's mother, who was her most intimate friend for years. It was at Mrs. Baxter's house that I first met Mrs. Clemmer Ames, which was her name then and the one under which she won her literary laurels. Mrs. Baxter was a charming old lady, short of stature, full in figure, and with her hair arranged in puffs or "barrel curl" on either side of her gentle face. One of the most conspicuous ornaments in Mrs. Baxter's parlor was a little copper-toed boot, which was covered with a glass case and occupied the central place on the mantelpiece. This mouldy little boot had been worn by Dr. Baxter when he was child, and had been carefully preserved by his mother. She brought it from the attic one day and showed it to Mrs. Ames, who was then visiting her. Mrs. Ames immediately dedicated a poem to The Little Boot, which was never carried back to its former hiding place, but ever after remained in the parlor—a puzzle to curious strangers and a tangible proof of the poetry existing in unpoetical objects.

MRS. AMES' EARLY LIFE.

Mary Clemmer was married before the war to Mr. Ames, who was a preacher of indifferent ability, "a poor provider," in country parlance, and a man with little capacity in any sense. They did not live happily together, and it was through no fault of hers. Thrice she established him in business at Harper's Ferry, using the fruits of her own labor for this purpose, and as many times he failed. Finding that she must support herself, if not a shiftless husband, she removed to this city, where she could have a wider field for her literary labors; and here, for years before she was divorced, she worked unceasingly until she was recognized as the best female correspondent in America. Though she is best known to the public through her letters to the Independent, she has written a number of books, among which are Ten Years in Washington, Eirene, His Two Wives, Men, Women and Things, a volume of poems and a memorial volume to the Carey sisters. No poem she ever wrote has been so widely copied and so freely appropriated by plagiarists as Tired Mothers. How many mothers, I wonder, have wept over the touching pathos of that poem, believing it to be the genuine wail of a bereaved mother for her dead child. As a matter of fact, she never had a child, and consequently never lost one. The union of physical and mental strength, coupled with her bright face and cordial manner, make her irresistibly attractive to both men and women. Without a trace of masculinity, she yet looks like a tower of strength compared with the weaker ones of her sex, who are apt, while in her presence, to have a consciousness of their own dependence and insignificance. A fragile, tired-looking little lady gave vent to this feeling at a reception one evening, by exclaiming to Mrs. Clemmer: "Oh! you great, splendid creature! I never see you without wanting to lean upon you for support." And those to whom she has been a prop and stay can testify to her tenderness as well as her strength. For many years she divided her time between her literary work and her invalid father, to whom she was a devoted nurse until his death, which occurred about two years ago. Her mother is still living, and very proud and fond the old lady is, too, of her talented daughter. It is an open secret to her intimate friends that Mrs. Clemmer would have been married years ago had it not been for the hopeless state of the father's health and his utter helplessness, which necessitated her almost constant presence in the sick room. The pretty house on Capitol hill, which this gifted woman purchased with her pension money, and in which she enjoyed the realization of a happy home, so long denied her, will be occupied by herself and husband when they return from their bridal tour. For Mr. and Mrs. Hudson, after their unostentatious wedding, departed quietly for Europe. Recalling the beautiful letter which Mrs. Clemmer once wrote abou May at the Capital, a friend expressed surprise that its author had not chosen May for her wedding month. May is undoubtedly the prettiest of all months in Washington; but May is also a proverbially unlucky month for marriages, and even some very wise people have their superstitions. Even so wise a man and so great a statesman as Mr. Blaine is not superior to a little superstitious weakness now and then. When he moved into his handsome new house last winter, he immediately gave a large reception, the only reason being that his daughter was soon to be married, and he believed ill luck would follow the occupants of a new house should a wedding be the first festivity held therein. Then, there is Mrs. Vinnie Ream Hoxie, who believes that all sorts of direful results would ensue should she use a single black pin in making her toilet. And, speaking of Mrs. Hoxie, reminds me that this little sculptress is so thoroughly engrossed with her new baby that it is doubtful whether she ever makes another statue, or even a bust "And what does it signify," thinks the proud papa, "when we have a regular buster!"

CAPITAL CHATTER.

The president continuing to remain within earshot of the city, at his pretty cottage in Soldiers' Home grounds, it has become less fashionable to desert thus early in the season, and society still makes a fair show on the drive and promenade. Informal visiting is much in vogue, and one of the pleasantest places for an evening call is at the house of our new postmaster general, where one is sure to meet a room full of pleasant people, Gen. Gresham and his family having made themselves very popular by their easy, hoosier-like hospitality. Miss Gresham is a brunette with the black eyes and heavy eyebrows of her father, while Mrs. Gresham is a modest, brown-haired woman of petite figure. A society item has been going the rounds describing Mrs. Gresham as "a lady with peachy complexion and a wealth of golden hair," this being so far from the truth that some of the lady's friends out west wondered if Washington had demoralized her into "blondining" herself. But there is no cause for alarm. Mrs. Gresham is a sensible woman "with no biggod nonsense about her," as Mr. Sparkles would say, and her locks are neither blondined nor banged. A curious reporter, in a crowded hotel parlor, requested some one to point out the new postmaster general's wife, and a wag instantly singled out a rather loud young woman with yellow hair, who was thereupon written down —or up—as the new cabinet lady.

Seeing that we are all so sorry to have Gen. Sherman retire from the army as well as from the city, it is rather ungrateful in him to exhibit such willingness to leave us. "Oh! but I love the far West," he said, to a fair California girl the other evening. "I know every man, woman and child on the Pacific coast." Then, observing that his claim of such a large acquaintanceship caused some amazement, he hastily qualified it by adding, "At least I did once—I don't now." Jolly, gray-haired old Tecumseh! How we shall miss him; for everybody likes him, although he is a bit of a braggart who can no more help kissing every pretty girl he meets than he can help poking fun at the "pope's big toe" when Mrs. Sherman reverently speaks of "his holiness."

A PIRATE'S RETREAT.

Three Young Men Beard the Old Tar in His Den, and Are Treated to Lobsters, Clams and Thrilling Tales of Old Sea Days.

NANTASKET BEACH, Boston Harbor, Special Correspondence, June 27.—At early daybreak yesterday a party of three rowed away from the slimy and decaying wharves of Boston, out into the stream, and up alongside of the trim little sloop, the Dolly D. We three—Frank, Will and I—were off upon a yachting cruise, whither our fancy dictated. As we hoisted anchor and swung off to the impulse of the freshening breeze, which bellied out the snowy-white canvas, the rising sun just peeped above the headlands of the islands and smiled promises of a pleasant day. The brawny arm of old Ben the skipper, resting on the wheel, guided the yatch, while the rest of us stowed ourselves away in the most convenient and comfortable places. To the left, outlined against the sky, we could see the old tree that floats at high tide and marks the place where years before was Bird island, now all washed away by the voracious Atlantic save a long, low ridge of mud. On this island, away back in the old colonial days, the pirates who were so unfortunate as to be captured by the authorities were executed, their bodies being hung in chains as a warning to others. There the birds feasted upon the remains, and when all had rotted the mass fell through the iron embraces to the ground below and returned to mother earth. Directly across President's Roads we sailed, past the high, verdure-crowned headland of Long Island, whose beacon light had just been extinguished, and on toward the gloomy, black pyramid of hewn stone that rose from out the sea, like the threatening hand of death, to the height of over thirty feet. This monument of granite marks an extensive shoal, which was once an island containing twelve acres, and is known as Nix's Mate. While we were discussing whether the pirate Nix killed his mate and buried him with the chest of gold on the island, or whether the mate killed Nix and was hanged on the scene of the murder, traditions about which all accounts disagree, old Ben broke in by saying:

"Talking of piruts, why, damme, I can take yer to a man on one of these 'ere islands who was wunst a slaver, a smug'ler and a pirut, 'though he won't allow he cut throats for a livin'."

"Is that so! Where does he live?" was the general exclamation and query.

"He lives all alone on Grape island, and—"

"A hermit, eh?"

"Y-a-a-s, I guess that's it. He's lived there fur years. He's the biggest cusser in this 'ere harbor; kinder cranky, too."

"What do you say to invading the lonely isle and have a peep at this strange character?" said Frank.

"Ef he'll let yer," broke in Ben. "He's mighty careless with his old musket."

"We'll take the chances," said Frank.

The yacht's course was changed and about noon we arrived in Quincy bay and got a glimpse of Grape island, which lies a short distance from the mainland, between the mouths of the Weymouth, Fore and Back rivers. It is a queer shaped piece of land, containing about fifty acres, with headlands at either end. As we drew nearer we could see the hut or hermitage of the old captain standing alone in the valley formed by the two hills, surrounded by a few bushes and a mass of debris of every description, parts of wrecked vessels, drift wood and other things borne to the island and cast up on its shores by the waves. It looked lonely and deserted, and seemed a fitting habitation for such a being as the old captain was said to be. On the crest of the highest hill were half a dozen leafless, bark-stripped saplings, planted perhaps for company, which evidenced a dismal failure at tree planting.

THE HERMIT'S HUT.

And this hut, as we came closer, seemed fit to adorn any tale of desperate deeds done under the cover of darkness. It was a two-story affair—the second formed by a pitched roof—that had perhaps been painted white when built, but which was now of a dull, weather-gray hue. Its storm-stained sides showed traces of decay, and save for the protection of the friendly hills, which received the brunt of Boreas' blast, the old house must long ago have succumbed to the weather. No living thing had yet presented itself to our view, and we were in some doubt whether we had better land. Guided by Ben's skilled hands the yacht had run up the little cove in a line with the house, and the sails were fluttering and flapping as her head was brought up into the wind. A good jump would land us high and dry on shore, but if any one of us had it in his mind to do so he was prevented by the sudden and startling uprising of a burly form from behind a pile of lobster traps on the beach before us, and the hospitable greeting of "What in — do yer want, — yer?" It was the ex-pirate, slaver and smuggler. No one could be mistaken in him, for a more typical face was not to be found in any pirate book or wax-work show. He was, indeed, a curious specimen of humanity. Of not more than medium size, yet his well-knit frame showed that great strength was at command. His face was wrinkled from chin to pate, and for the most part was covered with stubble beard, grizzled by years. His eyes were restless, and as fierce in appearance as their color blue could carry out. His skin had been tanned by so many suns in all climates that it resembled a Malay's in color. But what absorbed the attention was his strange and wonderful trousers. In constructing this curiosity the owner evidently began with a hole, around which he put a piece of canvass and another of red flannel. Having thus secured a substantial foundation he gradually built upon it with stray pieces of rags until one leg was finished. This was carefully preserved until another hole was captured. Having secured this so it could not escape with a small piece of the American flag, additions were from time to time made with remnants of old clothes washed ashore, including a ruffle or two from some woman's skirt. A strong piece of leather was utilized as a seat, and the whole affair hitched together with string shoved through small holes. Buttons there were none, small sticks being used as staple pins. But the old man was waiting a reply.

"Thought I'd drop down and see yer," said Ben in his pleasantest manner, as he heaved the anchor overboard.

"Don't want to see yer—yer," snarled the captain as he took a step forward and scowled at us.

"How did yer pass the winter?" asked Ben, not minding the gruff manner and getting into the boat with the rest of us.

"Fightin' the rats; most like to eat me up," was the more gracious answer given as we stepped on board.

After a little more talk he became somewhat sociable, and accepted a couple of cigars in his awkward manner. At our request he agreed to boil us some lobsters and clams for dinner, and told us to go up to the house while he went and got them. We did so, and before his return we had a good chance to look at the place. It was a rare rookery, and contained a little of everything in the way of trash. Old pieces of tarred rope, scraps of rusty iron, pieces of wood, old bottles cast up on the beach, nets, rusty tins, etc.—the flotsam and jetsam of years. In one corner were stowed a hammock, dirty and torn; in another, an old stove, cracked and minus a leg, while in a third, against the wall, stood parts of the cabin of some wrecked vessel. Stowed away under the door-sill, filling up a hole that time had dug in the heart of the pine, were three Indian hatchets of stone, which Capt. Smith afterwards told us he found among a heap of clam shells one day while he was digging. They were about a foot beneath the ground, set up edgewise in a circle, the center being filled with gravel from the beach. In a short time the old captain returned with a bucket of fine looking clams and three lobsters, all of which he proceeded to boil upon the rickety, smoke-begrimed stove, and in the course of half an hour he banged the bucket, filled with the smoking-hot clams, upon the top of the rough, drift-wood table, and told us to pitch in. We did so like half-famished men, the early morning sail having given us a sharp appetite, and I for one can say, I never enjoyed a meal so much as I did that one on fat and juicy bivalves, sweet and fresh. The dinner had a wonderful effect upon us all, and the ex-pirate allowed his tongue to wag at both ends—something unusual for him.

THE OLD MAN'S YARN.

"Don't you ever get lonely living here, Cap.?" I said, making a dive for the head of a monster clam, which temptingly protruded from beneath the steaming shells.

"Lonely be —; only ladies' men git lonely. Ef yer gits lonely, read ther History of the World; ef yer don't like that, take ther History of Catholicism —that's a good book. When yer gits tired of that, take that lying Bible," was the very startling and unsatisfactory answer.

Silence reigned for some time, only being broken by the noise of the empty clam shells as they dropped into the waste buckets. Finally old Ben, who seemed more at home with the captain, said:

"Can't yer tell the gentlemen something about your adventures when yer was a slaver, Smith."

"W-a-a-l," slowly drawled out the captain, as he looked out through the dirty, cobwebbed windows, hung with old horse shoes and rusty pieces of wire, to the green fields beyond, as if he could see far back into the past: "I was born in ther State of Maine nigh onto eighty years ago, an' I aint dead yet," and the old rascal wrinkled up his face worse than ever, with a hearty laugh, and showed us the snags of his used-up teeth.

"Yes, you look pretty hearty," I ventured to say.

"I'm pretty well, 'cept rheumatism; that sometimes ketches me acrost here," as he put his hands on his stomach; "but since I was sunstruck I aint good fur much."

"Been to sea a good deal?"

"Most all my life. Began when I was a boy. I was kidnapped by a tin peddler an' taken to Bowdoinham. I ran away from him an' went ter Bath, where a feller asked me ef I wanted ter go ter sea. I sed 'yes,' an' got right out of the team an' went along. I left ther hoss ter take care of hisself," and the speaker indulged in a sort of reminiscent chuckle.

"You went into the slave trade?"

"Yes: I was down in ther West Injies, an' ther cap'n of the Golden Star offered me four doubeloons a month, two doubeloons down. I was only nineteen then, an' I went. We had a good trip, but when we was about fifty miles from St. Thomas, with 700 niggers in the hold, I seed a sail away off bearing adown on us what I knowed was the Black Joke. The Black Joke used ter be a pirut ship, but one day when we—I mean when ther crew was a having a spree on an island—a English and American cruiser 'sprised them an' captured ther hull lot. I seed ther captain an' eighteen other men hung, an' sum of ther men had their legs an' arms chopped off. They let ther rest of ther crew go, and ther English bought ther American cruiser's part of ther Black Joke an' made a pelter out of her."

"What is a pelter?"

"Why, a man-er-war. As I was a sayin', I knowed the Black Joke, so I told ther captain about it. Ther breeze was light an' we couldn't get away, an' ther Black Joke put out her sweeps an' crawled up alongside. We had plenty of guns an' sixty-five men, all crazy to fight. We cleared ther decks, an' a shot from ther Black Joke's long Tom came er whistling through our riggin' an' carried away ther shrouds. We came up close together, and we poured a broadside inter her, zip-zip, twing-twing," and the old man's eyes fairly sparkled with excitement as he recounted the effect of the shot.

"Yes, yes, go on."

"We fought for our lives, an' when ther Black Joke's men came aboard the Golden Star, we drove 'em back with pistol, dirk an' cutlass, an' boarded their ship. We killed 'em all 'cept twelve, who we drove inter the fo'castle. All of us was wounded, an' I had nine bad cuts on me. While we was a getting ther Black Joke's long tom aboard ther Golden Star, ther men in ther fo'castle charged on us, but we killed them all or threw them overboard. While we was a plunderin' ther Black Joke we spied an English frigate bearin' down on us, but a breeze sprung up and we clapped on all ther sail we had an' got away. Ther frigate lashed ther Black Joke alongside with three turns of chain ter keep her from sinkin', an' took her inter St. Thomas. I was ther second lieutenant of ther Golden Star."

"Wasn't it strange that slavers carried crews of sixty-five and had second lieutenants?" said I.

"No," snapped out the old pirate, and he put on a scowl which was expected to settle me and put a stop to further questioning.

"Purty good business, wasn't it?" said old Ben, as he dropped the last clam down his capacious throat and pulled out his plug of tobacco.

"Yes," snarled Smith.

"Was yer ever with ther pirates?" continued Ben, putting a monster chew into his mouth.

"No, but I was with ther smugglers for a long time. I owned three small vessels an' we smuggled anything and everything along ther Spanish main. Used ter have some purty hot times some nights, when English gunboats used ter chase us; didn't care nuthin' about the Spaniards. We had our headquarters in ther bayous near New Orleans, but we had ter give up ther business when it got ter hanging. I made $45,000, and was robbed of all of it in ther yeller fever hospital in New Orleans. I saw ther old thief acoming fur my money, an' I prayed ther Almighty for jest strength enuff to hold my pistol one minnit till I'd afetched him. But it 'want no use; couldn't do nothin' but swear an' look, so I was ruined."

"How long have you lived here all alone?"

"Ten years next August. I don't own anything 'cept what I pick up. Taint like runnin' 700 niggers inter Martinique an' making yer pile. I ain't bin ter ther main shore more'n two times in ther ten years, an' I don't see many people an' don't want ter. It's mighty cold an' nasty here in winter, but I don't mind it."

We stayed with the old man, whose right name is Amos Pendleton, until quite late in the afternoon, when, paying him for what we had had, with provisions, we returned to the yacht, and just as the sun dropped out of sight in the West we dropped anchor at the mouth of Weir river, here at Nantasket beach, and sat down in the cabin to a supper of hot Boston canned baked beans, black coffee and hardtack.

NELSE.

Baron Erlanger's Credit.

The Erlanger affair is creating great excitement on the Paris bourse. The authorities seem to have received strict orders to run down all bankers whose solvability is at all liable to suspicion. The complainants against Erlanger who had been indemnified were willing to withdraw their complaint, but the procureur de la Republique has taken the matter up briskly. The causes of the indictment must be very serious, as a great number of documents have been seized. It is thought that some arrests will soon take place. Erlanger is a Prussian, and is supposed to be Bismarck's agent. Owing to this he has received very little sympathy. The bourse is delighted at these proceedings, because, rightly or wrongly, Erlanger is believed to have profited largely by the krach. The origin of Erlanger's fortune was a loan contracted by the confederates during the American war, when it was he who issued the stock in France.

A FAIRY HAND.

What a fairy hand she had
Twenty years ago!
Heigh ho, heigh ho!
Like a nestling dove it was,
And as white as snow,
Heigh ho, heigh ho!

Now she's forty-four and fat,
What a change in truth!
Heigh ho, heigh ho!
Daphne's hand has grown so red—
Like a ham, forsooth,
Heigh ho, heigh ho!

A LIFETIME IN COURT.

The Persistent Struggle of Myra Clark Gaines to Prove Her Legitimacy and Heirship.

Repeated Successes and Discomfitures of a Plucky Woman—A Heavy Judgment.

New Orleans Letter to the Philadelphia Press: There came to Louisiana in 1790, soon after the outbreak of the French revolution, an emigre nobleman, Jerome De Grange, who fled to this country to escape the guillotine, and who had lost his large fortune in that great popular outburst. There was nothing left for him to do but go to work, and to work he went and established a cafe and confectionery on St. Anne street, opposite the Place d'Armes, in what was then the social and fashionable center of the little Creole city of New Orleans. Here he met a graceful, voluptuous little lady, Marie Julie Carriere, a Provencale, with a dash of gypsy blood in her veins, a mere child in years, but with the form, figure and development of a full grown woman. The exiled nobleman saw, loved, and proposed, and, dazzled by his title and aristocratic origin, the little girl—she was not quite thirteen at the time—consented to become his wife.

De Grange was more than twenty years older than his child-wife, very ugly, taciturn and unsociable, while Julie, as they nick-named her—for no Creole girl ever bears in later life her baptismal name—Zulime, was gay and lively, pleased with the attentions of gentlemen, devoted to balls, masked or otherwise, and loved, in fine, every species of fun, gayety and enjoyment. The marriage, however, proved a very profitable investment for the confectioner-count, for his little wife brought to the confectionery a great deal of business and patronage, and the great men of the then Spanish colony of Louisiana frequented his establishment, seduced there by the smiles and blandishments of the pretty, gay Madame Zulime.

Among these patrons came a certain young Irishman, Daniel Clark, the wealthiest merchant and perhaps the first man in the entire colony in fortune and influence. He was a dangerously attractive man to any woman. Of handsome presence, while De Grange was small, weazen and insignificant, with all the soft, seductive flattery of Ireland, a dangerous Lothario indeed, when he spoke of love in his soft mixture of brogue and Creole. He was in the very prime of life, slightly over thirty, a millionaire in an age when a million was a fabulous fortune, a man, moreover, of talents, ability, courage, and influence, and of aristocratic if not royal origin; tracing his descent from the ancient kings of Ireland.

At balls, at routs and festivities of all kinds, and often at the confectionery, pretty little Madame Zulime met this young cavalier. At the same time she was horrified at the discovery, that this husband of hers, Jerome De Grange, was a scoundrel who had betrayed her innocence, a Blue Beard who had an army of wives elsewhere.

This terrible disclosure was made to her by one of De Grange's victims, his first American wife, Barbara Jeanbelle d'Orsi, who had come to New Orleans in search of him. Almost at the same moment a third wife, a young Spanish girl, Maria Yulah, turned up. The three deceived women, Zulime, Barbara and Maria, all young and handsome, mingled their tears together over Jerome's villainy, and then marched arm-in-arm to the old cabildo to lay their charges against this French Mormon.

THE LAST OF DE GRANGE.

In those days cases of this kind, against public morals, were tried, not by criminal court, but before his grace the bishop of Orleans and the Floridas. The unlucky De Grange was arrested and brought before this ecclesiastical court, on the charge of immorality and bigamy —if it be bigamy to have three wives. Zulime, Barbara and Maria each testified against him, and told their sad stories, how this ugly, pock-marked, red-faced little fellow had succeeded in winning all their hearts. So clearly was the confectioner's villainy laid bare that his grace the bishop sentenced him at once to the calabosa.

A friend of De Grange assisted him to escape from prison and chartered a vessel for him, in which he fled from Louisiana and his triumvirate of woes.

Zulime was not without comfort and consolation in her widowhood, for her former admirer, Clark, redoubled his attentions to her and whispered dangerous counsel in her ear.

It would be best, she saw, to secure further and legal evidence of De Grange's previous marriage, and to do this it was necessary to go to New York. Clark readily assented to this, especially as he himself was about to take a trip North to Philadelphia on an important political mission.

On the very day of her arrival in New York Zulime hurried to St. Peter's, in which the marriage between De Grange and Barbara had taken place. She learned, with sorrow, that all the records of the church had been burned just before her arrival. When she and Clark met again in Philadelphia after this failure, he renewed his suit so vigorously that she yielded to his arguments and consented to a secret marriage, not to be made public until they could secure some better evidence of De Grange's bigamy. The marriage—on which Mrs. Gaines' claims rest—took place in a strange house in a back street in a retired portion of Philadelphia. There were present an unknown Irish priest, who performed the ceremony, two unknown witnesses, friends of Clark, and Sophie Desban, Zulime's sister.

Alas! Poor Zulime soon found that it was "out of the frying-pan into the fire." Clark, who had been the most devoted of lovers, proved cold and careless as soon as he had trapped her into the secret marriage. He left soon after for France, and although upon his return he provided her and her sister with a suburban villa near New Orleans, he refused to publish or announce the marriage, pretended in public to be a bachelor, and made love to every single woman he met. Nor even when, in the course of time, a child was born of this secret marriage—Myra Clark, afterward known as Myra Clark Gaines—did he evince any more love for the mother. The child was taken away from her immediately after birth and given out to nurse, and its existence carefully concealed from all but his more intimate friends.

THE LITIGATION.

After various legal skirmishes the issue was finally joined by Mrs. Gaines bringing suit against the principal purchasers of her father's estate. Her suit, in fine, was to prove the marriage between Zulime and Clark, and thus establish her own legitimacy, but it involved a large amount of property, as Clark had more real estate, perhaps, than any man in America. The purchasers of this property united against her, and fought her in the courts, step by step. Never was a case more vigorously contested. In 1848, just sixteen years after the original case was brought, Mrs. Gaines won a signal victory, the highest tribunal in the land—the United States supreme court—deciding in her favor, and declaring that a marriage had taken place between Zulime and Clark, and that Myra, as the only child of that marriage, was entitled to four-fifths of Clark's estate.

It proved, however, to be a barren victory. The other defendants were still united, and she found that, to secure the property, she would have to bring suits against each of them in succession, as her judgment applied only to Patterson, and was good against none of the others. Slowly her suit against Chew and Relf, the executors, went up to the supreme court. The defense this time, however, was much more vigorous than that made in the Patterson case, and Mrs. Gaines was brought face to face for the first time with the other side of the case, and it was quite different from the story that her foster father had told her on his wedding day.

AGED ROUES IN COURT.

This case was tried in 1851, fifty-seven years after the marriage of Zulime and De Grange, and forty-nine years after the alleged marriage with Clark. As most of the testimony referred to these events, it may be imagined that there were no very youthful witnesses on the stand. A fit sample of their testimony was in the identification of De Grange. Half of the witnesses swore that they had known him well. That he was six feet or more in height, stout, fine looking, and of aristocratic origin; the other half were intimately acquainted with him, and he was a little, five-foot six-inches fellow, red-faced and pock-marked, in fine an insignificant little syrup maker, instead of a magnificent count.

The story of De Grange's trial for bigamy, on which Zulime's second marriage rested, also disappeared before the sturdy evidence of judicial documents. When the musty old records of the ecclesiastical court were examined in Havana, where they were carried when the Spanish surrendered Louisiana, it was found that De Grange was tried, but, as both of the women alleged to be his wives swore positively that they had never been married to him, he was honorably acquitted by the bishop.

THE DEFENSE.

The story of the defense, in fine, was as follows: A French confectioner, no count at all, but an honest, industrious man, Jerome De Grange, fell in love with, and married, a pretty girl of no family at all, and very little standing, Zulime Carriere. While the husband worked hard for the support of the family, the wife was gadding about the streets, at balls and parties, flirting with all the wild young men and roues of the city. One of these cavaliers, Daniel Clark, was quite taken by the pretty face of the young gypsy, and showered his attentions on her—in fine, she became his mistress. The husband being in the way, it was determined to get rid of him. Zulime pretended to have claims to some property in France, and De Grange was persuaded to visit that country to look after this matter. Clark advanced him the money for this purpose, and the confectioner bid New Orleans a long adieu, leaving his pretty little wife behind to the care and protection of his supposed friend.

No sooner was he out of the way than Zulime turned all his available property into cash and left for Philadelphia, not, however, to marry, as had been pretended, but for quite a different purpose, for soon after her arrival there she gave birth to a girl, Caroline, whose parentage was never exactly known, as the mother told De Grange that it was his child at the same time that she persuaded Clark that he was the father.

Mrs. Gaines was astonished, perhaps, when this suit of hers discovered this new sister, one who, like herself, had been taken away from her mother by Clark soon after her birth and had been brought up ignorant of the names of either of her parents. The two sisters, Myra and Caroline, had been brought up within a few miles of each other, Myra in Philadelphia, Caroline in New Jersey, near Trenton, utterly ignorant of their relationship, ignorant even of each other's existence.

That sister was one of the most earnest witnesses against her. Her foster-brother, Horatio Davis, with whom she had been brought up, also testified against her; so did Dr. Gardette's children; so even did the Chevalier De La Croix, who had been appointed her guardian. The most savage attacks were made on Zulime's reputation, and a score of aged gallants, smiling and smirking, told the stories of their youthful escapades and immoralities, and related the general belief in early New Orleans that both Zulime and her sister Sophie were those femmes gallantes of whom Brantome loves to write.

As for the pretended marriage with Clark, the only witness, Sophie, a woman of bad character too, had just fixed 1803 as the date, afterward, 1802, while Mrs. Gaines' counsel thought 1801 more probable; and as neither the day, the month, the year, the place, the priest or the witnesses could be remembered or found, it was very shaky testimony.

WAS CLARK'S WILL DESTROYED?

As for the will of 1813, that had undoubtedly been made by Clark and destroyed by him when he found it worthless. He had consulted Etienne Magureau, the most eminent lawyer of Louisiana, on the subject of this will, and they showed Magureau's statement on the subject. "You cannot," he wrote Clark, "leave the child Myra anything. The civil law prohibits a child born of a married woman by any one but her husband from receiving any property as an inheritance. If you wish to give her anything give it to some friend whom you can trust for her use." Following this advice Clark conveyed a large sum of money to her foster-father, Davis, and destroyed the will, so the defense said.

Such was the explanation given by the defense of the various points made by Mrs. Gaines. The supreme court accepted them as satisfactory, and declared that no marriage between Zulime and Clark was proved, and then, after expending a fortune on this suit, Mrs. Gaines found herself, at the end of nineteen years, completely non-suited.

In no wise dismayed by this Waterloo, she at once began a new suit, dropping the marriage question this time and bringing suit under the supposedly destroyed will of 1813, in which Clark constituted her his heir. Another victory awaited her. The State supreme court ordered this will probated, and when the case reached the United States supreme court, in 1861, just as the war broke out, that court also, but by a bare majority of 1—4 to 3—decided in her favor.

This was Mrs. Gaine's great victory. There was no appeal, no way of calling up the case again.

After the war, Mrs. Gaines took up her case again. Again she struck a rock. The probate court of New Orleans proved unfriendly and refused to probate her will. Congress passed just then a bill to protect Republicans in the South, which provided that where there was local prejudice against the plaintiff or defendant in a suit, he could have the case transferred to the United States circuit court. Mrs. Gains claimed a right to transfer her case to the circuit court. Again she was victorious.

Having exhausted all the private persons interested in this suit, Mrs. Gaines turned on the city of New Orleans, which had unfortunately become involved in this case. A portion of Clark's St. Johnsburgh property was sold to Evariste Blanc for its full value, and by him resold to Municipality No. 1, one of those three divisions of New Orleans, existing fifty years ago, when the race hostility between Creoles and Americans was so bitter that the legislature found it necessary to divide New Orleans into three cities or municipalities, each with its separate mayor and city council. Municipality No. 1 finally sold this property to various people.

Three years ago the circuit court appointed E. Sabourin master of chancery, to calculate the value of the rents and fruits of the Blanc property, for which Mrs. Gaines was suing. Sabourin has been busy at this work for three years. His report, which is one of the most exhaustive and gigantic on record—it cost only $30,000 to prepare it—declared the city of New Orleans to be indebted to Mrs. Gaines on this Blanc property to the amount of $1,622,061.

THE LAST JUDGMENT RENDERED.

It was this report that Judge Billings passed judgment on the other day, endorsing and approving the report, and adding the $303,606.83 of costs and charges that had accumulated in the meanwhile, and bringing up the judgment to $1,925,667.83.

This sum the city of New Orleans is condemned to pay. What has been the cost of this suit will never be known to any one but Mrs. Gaines. All of her husband's fortune was dissipated in costs; all of the immense sums obtained by her, either by judgments or compromises, have gone into the maw of the law. Armies of attorneys have lived off this case. One lawyer is estimated to have made $60,000 out of it in fees, and there are probably a dozen others who have made from $20,000 to $40,000 each. And yet Mrs. Gaines is to-day probably poorer than she was when she first appeared in court to prosecute her claim, fifty-one years ago, a charming bride. She has buried two husbands; many of her children are dead, and she is now an old woman, but with all the vivacity and sprightliness of her younger days, the only survivor of the original Gaines case.

A Washington Sunday.

Residents of Washington are discussing and agitating the question of opening on Sunday the National museum, Smithsonian Institution, Congressional library and similar institutions at the capital. At present these places observe the same hours in opening and closing as the departments, thereby debarring all government clerks and employes from visiting them, and this fact is used as a strong plea in favor of throwing open the doors for a few hours on Sunday. Librarian Spofford strongly favors and recommends the opening of the Congressional library. Prof. Baird says that he has not the power to make the innovation in regard to the National museum, but thinks that the attendance on Sunday would be two or three times larger than on week days. Col. Robert G. Ingersoll contributes a characteristic letter to the discussion, in the course of which he says: "I am in favor of all libraries, parks, museums and picture galleries being open on Sunday. Sunday should be a day of joy and recreation. The gloom of the Puritan Sabbath has darkened lives enough. The idea that we can make God happy by making ourselves miserable is the extreme of folly. I want to see the people enjoying themselves. It is not recreation to go to church and hear about total depravity and eternal fire. There is nothing in the average sermon to cheer the average man."

THE WOODS THAT BRING THE SUNSET NEAR."

The wind from out the west is blowing,
The homeward-wandering cows are lowing;
Dark grow the pine-woods, dark and drear—
The woods that bring the sunset near.

When o'er wide seas the sun declines,
Far off its fading glory shines;
Far off, sublime, and full of fear—
The pine-woods bring the sunset near.

This house that looks to east, to west,
This, dear one, is our home, our rest;
Yonder the stormy sea, and here
The woods that bring the sunset near.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

There will be a rattling among the dry bones of the senate if the revision of the rules of that body, which has just been prepared to be submitted to the committee on rules at Bar Harbor, Me., next week shall be adopted. The scheme involves the previous question; the destruction in part of the principle of seniority on the committee service, which helps to perpetuate the senate oligarchy and to give inferior men great advantage; the adoption of something like system in the treatment of public business; the limitation of service on important committees; the driving of lobbyists from the floor, and other important reforms.

Both the Omaha route and Milwaukee & St. Paul have dining cars on their through trains from St. Paul. The dining car service of each company will be under the immediate direction of officials of the companies.

GENERAL NEWS NOTES.

A number of light showers fell Wednesday and Thursday morning. Vegetation has been very much revived, but considerable more water is needed. The crops do not appear to have suffered so much as was generally supposed, but the danger they were in was sufficient to cause much anxiety. The wheat is up about two feet, and therefore sufficiently strong to hold its own for a while. The rains that fell were very general throughout the Red river valley. They were not, however, continuous nor heavy.

Ten thousand iron workers in Staffordshire, England, who are on a strike, with banners, marched, to Dudly Port and Tipton, and entered the iron works at those places and quenched the fires in the furnaces, thus stopping all work. A force of police on hand were powerless to prevent the action of the strikers. The strikers stopped work at many other places. The mob dwindled as the day wore on. The police finally dispersed the remnant of the mob and arrested the ringleader.

The headquarters of the Salvation army in Peterson, N. J., including the Hallelujah restaurant, are in the hands of the sheriff. Six months ago the army purchased the lease of a saloon and theater, and Mrs. Whitehead, a recent convert, advanced $1,000 on the note of Major Moore. Mrs. Whitehead hearing the major was about to sail for England obtained an attachment against the property. It is expected the matter will be compromised by Mrs. Whitehead assuming charge of the troops and restaurant.

The St. Louis house of delegates recently passed an ordinance which was previously adopted by the council, establishing high license for dram shops in conformity with the state law passed last winter. It was expected that licenses for beer and wine saloons would be made uniform with those for dram shops, but it was finally concluded to let them remain as heretofore which is only about one-quarter as high as for dram shops.

Three Lafayette county, Mo., judges, Lockhart, Harrison and Prather, who have been in jail at Jefferson City for several weeks, for refusing to levy a special tax to pay an installment of $2,000 on the judgment obtained by Cochran Fleming on the bonds of the county, have been released, the two former on leave of absence, the last by order of Judge Krekel of the United States district court, because his term had expired.

The proposition of Peter McGeoch the busted card man to his creditors to settle at the rate of 50 cents on the dollar, bids fair to fall through, owing to the refusal of several heavy creditors to sign an agreement to that effect, and among other firms thus refusing, Geo. Eldridge & Co., whose claims amount to $93,000, are reported as demanding full payment.

A month's festivities on the 33d anniversary of the first European colonization of the city of Sante Fe, New Mexico, and the American continent opened recently under the most flattering auspices. The grand procession was perhaps the most unique and interesting of anything of the kind ever attempted by the descendants of the first distinguished Spaniard that ever visited American soil.

Judge W. R. Wagstaff, of the Paoli (Kans.) district, has been used by St. Louis parties for board, tuition and clothing furnished one Miss Lillie Torrey at the request of the defendant. The suit causes considerable talk, as Judge Wagstaff is a very prominent politician.

Official state reports from nearly all Arkansas counties announce that the wheat crop has been gathered. The yield was not as large as anticipated at the beginning of the season, but in point of quality the crop is above the average, the berry being plump and sound.

Rev. Mr. Percival's church in Philadelphia is disrupted on the question of high churchism. The rector is low church, and the high churchers are trying to oust him. They have the records and the civil courts thus far on their side.

Secretary Chandler to-day issued an order prohibiting the naval officers attached to cruising war vessels from transferring their families from their usual place of abode to more convenient visiting points. The penalty for disobedience is suspension from duty.

E. W. Barber of Casselton, who was tried at Fargo on the charge of murdering his son, was acquitted, the jury deliberating three hours on the verdict.

There was a cold wave all over the North on Saturday and Sunday which was particularly grateful to suffering New Yorkers.

After a long controversy, Nelson C. Draper has been appointed temporary tea inspector for the port of Chicago.

Litchfield, Ill., has put liquor licenses up from $200 to $500.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

John Armory Knox, editor and part proprietor of a Texas newspaper, and D. B. Shehan, a sculptor, fought a duel in a retired spot some four miles from Hoboken, N. Y., at about 11 o'clock on the 5th inst. Neither, it is certain was wounded. At 11 o'clock Knox and his second were on the ground—a swampy, barren field out of sight and hearing of any dwelling. The men were placed twenty paces apart. At the word "three" both fired, but without effect. Knox declared himself satisfied, but Shehan called for another shot. At the second fire Knox felt his left arm twitch and found that Shehan's bullet had passed through his coat and shirt, slightly grazing his skin. Shehan was untouched. The pair then shook hands and the proceedings were over.

Edward Whalen applied to the police of Attleboro, Massachusetts for a night's lodging, and admitted that he was an escaped convict from the state workhouse at Bridgewater, which burned the 7th. He said a negro, James Gilmore, who escaped with him, set the fire. Gilmore was arrested, and confessed. He said he had carried matches a year to accomplish it. He shoved straw up the ventilator flue and disabled the steam pump, and said he was glad the place was in ashes. "When I go, out of this," said he, "I will burn this town." The third convict escaped toward Providence.

The military convicts who escaped from prison at Fort Omaha (near Omaha) by overpowering the guard, were: James F. Anderson, who enlisted at Fort Omaha; Thomas Barber, enlisted at Philadelphia; Alonzo Barden; enlisted at Cleveland; Franklin Bratton, enlisted at Chicago; William Calhoun, enlisted at Fort Elliot, Tex.; Thomas Fitzgerald, enlisted at Boston; M. Lindsay, enlisted at Baltimore; Henry Martin, enlisted at Fort McKinney, having reenlisted from Fort Custer; Edward J. Murphy, enlisted at Washington; Frederick Parkhurst, enlisted at Detroit; George Price, enlisted at Albany, N. Y.

The jury in the case of George Grant colored, of Kansas City, returned a verdict of murder in the first degree. In April 1881, he shot and killed Police Officer Jones, who undertook to arrest him for thieving. A mob the same night captured a colored man named Harrington, mistaking him for the murderer, and lynched him on the street. Grant was afterward arrested, tried and convicted of murder. The court granted a new trial on a technical error, and the second trial is now concluded.

At Mount Sterling, Ky., a negro named Dick Biggers, who on the 3d attempted to rape a servant of T. C. Anderson, was taken from jail on the 7th and was about to be hung to a railroad bridge when Marshal Peuch, who broke up the celebrated Barnet bandits, appeared, and in a short speech pursuaded the crowd to let the negro be taken back to jail. The mob was masked, and numbered over fifty.

Anthony Genyck, French squawman at the Santee, Neb., committed suicide the 12th inst., during the absence of his family, who returned the next morning and found him dead, with a bullet hole in his head. He had $7,000 under his pillow and was worth $30,000.

Francis B. Webster of Cambridge, Mass., arrested on a charge of swindling the Alta Gold and Silver Mining company of New Mexico, out of $60,000, has been committed in default of $15,000 bail.

William L. Allen, publisher of the Evening Telegram and the Chicago World, has been arrested in Chicago for blackmail. He is charged with extorting $75 from Winship & Co., lottery agents.

The Southern Minnesota Fair association have issued a very neat premium list, in which they offer $7,000 in premiums at the coming fair in September.

For criticising the Tower city (Pa.) school board, J. R. Nelson, editor of the Echo, was horsewhipped by Mrs. McElwaine wife of one of the directors.

J. B. Sutphin's safe, at Duluth, was blown open, $40 taken and $100 damage done the safe and building.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

Maj. Melbourne, the father of Blanche Melbourne, said to be Mrs. Bush, of the Sartoris scandal, has received a telegram from Dr. Stephens of St. Louis, in which the latter denies ever having sanctioned the use of his name in connection with the scandal, and says he knows nothing about it. It will be remembered that Stephens is alleged to have identified Mrs. Bush as Blanche Melbourne. The major says the mystery will soon be cleared up. He thinks it a case of mistaken identity.

Mlle. Litta's funeral at Bloomington, Ill., was attended by 6,000 people, including sympathizing friends from different cities throughout the country. The funeral services were held in the First Methodist church, which was beautifully and appropriately decorated with floral tributes, one of the most conspicuous being a magnificent emblem, the gift of Ex-Vice President David Davis, representing a broken lyre. The senator and other distinguished persons were present.

Gen. Sibley of St. Paul, continues to improve, and his family physicians and friends are much encouraged. His vitality is wonderful, and his open air life has imbued every muscle with vigor unwonted in one who has attained so ripe an age.

Mrs. Garfield, with her daughter Mollie and two sons, is at Saratoga.

Hannibal Hamlin's two grand sons recently graduated at Harvard.

FOREIGN NEWS GOSSIP.

The report that James Carey has left Dublin is confirmed. The government refused to give him any reward or a written pardon. On the evening of the 2nd inst., a detective called upon him with an order for his delivery, and drove with him in a cab into the city. Having been given the alternative of being turned unprotected into the streets or a passage to London and thence to some colony in the Eastern hemisphere, he accepted the latter. His family had already gone to London separately, to avoid suspicion.

Trevalyan, chief secretary for Ireland, replying to O'Brien, member for Mallow, said he had been informed that of 1,000 emigrants who had gone to America, only two families have been inmates of workhouses at Belmullet, from which section they came, and they had received money on landing, and were doing well. He was not aware of the grounds on which the United States had returned emigrants, but suppose they thought those returned were not desirable settlers.

The English bishops have become alarmed at the public agitation to abolish their right to vote as peers in the house of lords because of their defeat of the deceased wife's sister marriage bill. They are about to prepare a statement of defense and have appointed a committee to draft the statement and place it before the English people. The statement will be based upon the alleged danger to English society which a change in the marriage laws would entail.

A Turco-American commission has been appointed to examine into the question of the establishment of a petroleum depot. The porte has addressed a note to Gen. Wallace, American minister, pointing out that it notified him of Turkey's withdrawal from the treaty of commerce with America on the eve of its expiration, and invited him to negotiate for the conclusion of a new treaty.

The Fourth was celebrated enthusiastically by American residents, at the City of Mexico. A banquet was given in Tivoli de San Cosme. Speeches were made by Minister Morgan, Consul General Strather, Mr. Odevey, and representative Mexicans, Frenchmen and Spaniards. Congratulatory letters were received from President Gonzales and Gov. Ferrandez of the Federal district.

A dispatch from Ennis, Ireland, states that a farmer named Wiffey has been shot and seriously wounded for taking a farm near that place which had been boycotted owing to the eviction of the former tenant. Wiffey's house was entered by disguised men, two of whom held him in bed while another fired three shots at him, shattering his knee.

A prisoner in Copenhagen named Nielson, who is charged with committing arson there, has confessed that he set fire to the Victoria docks, London, in 1881, with a view of obtaining plunder. The opinion heretofore entertained regarding the origin of the fire was that it was the work of Fenians.

In the district court at Omaha William Duncan was sentenced to fifteen years in the penitentiary for attempting rape upon his daughter, aged twelve years. Some years ago he was accused of the murder of his mother, but was tried and acquitted.

Death of Bishop McMullen of Iowa.

Bishop McMullen, of the Catholic diocese of Davenport, died at 4 o'clock on the 4th inst., after an illness of more than a year's duration. His ailment was cancerous affection of the stomach. He arrived in Davenport, Aug. 25, 1881, and in six months had visited every parish in his diocese and confirmed [illegible],000 persons. His arduous labors, with exposure, aggravated his disease, compelling them to desist. He was greatly beloved by his people here, and much respected by the Protestant community. He was sensible to the last, and conversed with priests but a few moments before he died. Bishop McMullen has very often been given up to die but has retained his hold on life with astonishing strength.

United Workmen in Litigation.

Waterloo, Iowa, Special Telegram, July 9.—The quo warranto proceedings instituted by the supreme lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen against the grand lodge of that order, comes before the circuit court which is in session now. The grand lodge, it will be remembered, was suspended by the supreme lodge, because of their refusal to pay the relief assessments ordered by that body. The grand lodge retained its unity, and a new grand lodge, holding allegiance to the supreme lodge, was formed. The action pending is to establish whether the old grand lodge has any right to use the name and the paraphernalia of the order. The attorneys for the defense were in the city to-day, and state that their first action will be the filing of a motion asking for a more specific statement in regard to the place of incorporation of the supreme lodge. It is claimed that that body was incorporated in Kentucky, and as such has no legal right to do business in Iowa without conforming to the insurance laws of this state. The grand lodge of Iowa has about 9,600 adherents in this state, and the supreme lodge claims 2,000 loyal members; but the officers of the grand lodge only concede them about 600. The attorneys for the plaintiff are Messrs. Lane & Rodgers of Davenport, and H. Hemenway of Cedar Falls. The defendants are represented by H. B. Fouke of Dubuque, J. D. Nichols of Stanton, J. J. Tolerton of Cedar Falls, and Horace Boiss of Waterloo. The case will probably go to the supreme court, no matter what the decision of the lower cours may be.

Death of Marie Litta.

Miss Maria Van Elsner, known to the northwestern musical world as Mlle Marie Litta, died at her home in Bloomington, Ill., lately. Her last public appearance in Bloomington was at a concert under the Slayton Lyceum bureau, at Durley hall, in February. Although acquitting herself brilliantly, her friends discovered that she was overtaxing her strength, and grave apprehensions were expressed by experienced and careful persons. She gave a reception to her friends after the concert. On that occasion her troubles were augmented and death was hastened by exposure to draughts while receiving and still feeling the heat of her work at the hall.

Mlle. Litta was born in Bloomington, Ill., June 1, 1856. Her father, Hugo von Elsner, was a German musician of noble birth and liberal education. He married a Miss Dimmitt of Bloomington, against her father's will, and thus incurred the displeasure of the Dimmitt family. In the year 1869 Prof. Anderner of Cleveland, Ohio become interested in the young vocalist, and in 1875, assisted by Mr. A. B. Hough, also of Cleveland, Ohio, he sent her to Europe for the purpose of completing her musical education which had been commenced at home. She remained four years in Paris.

She returned to the United States in 1878 under the management of Max Strakosch, and made a tour of the principal cities, appearing at McVicker's in 1879.

Shocking Disaster on the Clyde.

London Special: Intelligence has just reached here of a terrible calamity during the launching of the steamship Daphne, at Renfrew, five miles from Glasgow. While being launched she fell over on her side and precipitated a number of people into the water. The Daphne, which was constructed for coast trading, is a vessel of 500 tons burden. Two hundred workmen were on board when she capsized. The accident occurred in the middle of the Clyde, after launching. It is not exactly known how many persons were drowned, but it is feared the number will reach over a hundred. Traffic on the Clyde is suspended, owing to the interruption to navigation by the capsized steamer. The Daphne left the ways at a very fast rate, and when she gained the water she rolled from side to side. The persons on board fearing she would capsize, ran to and fro. The vessel finally reeled over and nearly disappeared beneath the water. Those who had maintained a position on the portion of the steamer not submerged did their utmost to save those who were in the water. At the same time boats pulled to assist in the work of rescuing the unfortunate men. There were fifty imprisoned when the vessel went over, and they must have been drowned.

Northern Pacific Land Sales.

The Northern Pacific land sales during the month of June were as follows: Eastern division—No. of acres, 62,062; amount realized, $262,688. Montana division—No. of acres, 11,644; amount realized, $125,700. Total acres, 97,651; total amount realized $444,832. During the month of June, 1882, the total number of acres sold was, 71.760, and the total amount realized was $231,201. The total sales for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, were 761.261 acres; amount realized, $3,052,048. In addition, there were realized from town lots during the year, $3,330,771, making the grand total for the year. $3,383,019 against a grand total of $1,709,338 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882. DOG AND WASP.

Exhibition of What Looked Like Reason By Lower Animals.

From the Rochester Democrat.

A small-sized but fleet running dog chased a large raccoon from a wheat field and overtook him on the bank of the creek, about a rod from the water. The raccoon faced the dog and sat upon his haunches for battle. The dog seized him just below the fore legs in front and tried to shake him but could not, for he was heavier than the dog. The animal immediately set his long, sharp teeth in the side of the dog's head and clasped him in his claws. The dog whining with pain, tried to pull away and shake off the raccoon, but was held fast, when he turned to the creek and dragged the raccoon, which still clung to him, into the creek, where he held him under water, adroitly keeping his own nose out, till the raccoon became so exhausted that the dog shook him off and then seized him by the throat and mastered him. The occupant of a room with the door open into the street was startled one day by the entrance, with a buzzing noise, of a large bluish wasp of the kind that captures spiders to place in their nests for their growing wasps to feed upon. After flying around the wasp went to a corner where a large house spider had made a broad web near the ceiling, with a long close hiding place extending down in the corner. The wasp flew under the web and examined this hiding-place closely apparently to see if the spider was home, and then, as if satisfied of the fact, flew out into the room, and, returning, dropped down on the center of the web, buzzing and fluttering like a caught fly. Thereupon the old soldier rushed out in great haste to capture his prey, and as soon as he came within reach the wasp picked him up and flew away with him. Was it reason or instinct that caused the action of these two animals under these circumstances? Whaterey says "instinct is a blind tendency to some mode of action independent of any consideration on the part of the agent or the end to which the action leads." Did these animals have no "consideration" or expectation of the "end or object to which their action led?"

Mrs. Agassiz found one morning in one of her slippers a cold little slimy snake, one of six sent the day before to her scientific spouce and carefully set aside by him for safety under the bed. She screamed, "There is a snake in my slipper!" The savant leaped from his bed crying, "A snake! Good heavens. Where are the other five?"

PIPES AND PUFFERS.

Popular Bowls, Economical Cobs, and Valuable Meerschaum Stems.

From the Philadelphia Press.

The true home of the pipe and the fragrant weed smoked therein, tobacco, is America. Few persons will dispute that fact. The discoverer equally of the virtues of the tobacco and the tobacco pipe was, undoubtedly, the original inhabitant of America, the red Indian; so Americans have excellent reasons to take the fullest interest in all that concerns the pipe and its manufacture.

The pipe of primitive smokers—and your true smoker, it is said, prefers a pipe to a cigar—was a clay. The latter is the only kind of pipe prized by smokers, unless the corncob can be accepted, which has always been manufactured in this country, from the era prior to Columbus to the present day. North Carolina and Virginia is where it is made, the latter state receiving the palm for excellence. The Powhattan pipe of Virginia is supposed to be the sweetest smoking clay pipe manufactured. It is red brown in color, roughly constructed and hand polished. The principle maker is a gentleman of the name of Hatcher, who realizes a large income from the sale. Another celebrated pipe is the fluted clay, made by the negroes in North Carolina, the material being so porous that water will drop through it. The most renowned American clay pipe, however, is a rough-looking bowl made by a woman in North Carolina named Sally Micheal. She used to manufacture them before the war, but she was driven away from her pits by the Yankee armies. When peace was signed returned to her diggings and resumed the making of pipes, stamping them with the advertisement, "From the same old Pit." Any of the above mentioned clay pipes can be purchased for five cents a bowl. A more expensive pipe is also a North Carolina product, hand-fashioned by negroes, from what they call American meerschaum.

The cheap short clay pipes made complete with stems are imported from England, Germany, France, and Turkey. The latter country sends over bowls of a rare red clay, beautifully carved and inlaid with gold, costing from $1.50 to $5. Churchwardens are exclusively made in England. The Knickerbocker Club of Smokers in New York, a coterie of fine old gentlemen, meet annually for the sole object of smoking pipe after pipe of tobacco through the long fragile stems. During the operation they imbibe many goblets and tankards of ales and strong waters, and consequently at the end of the sitting a certain unsteadiness of the understanding is the result. Each man departs to his home taking his "churchwarden" with him. In nine cases out of ten he breaks it before he arrives at his domicile. If he succeeds, however in retaining his pipe intact he exhibits it proudly at the next annual session of his club and is immediately anointed vice president.

In the South all classes smoke pipes, from negro to gentlemen. Cigars are very sparingly used. In the Northern states of America cigars are in the ascendant, and until the war pipes were rarely seen. Now pipes have by degrees became not only popular, but fashionable. Men about town make beautiful collections of quaintly carved merchaums and rare wooden pipes. There are any number of varieties. In this city there are two large factories of a cheap pipe made from applewood and laurel, looking very much like briars. The latter variety, with the exception of pierced corncobs from Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, about concludes the list of American pipes.

Meerschaums are imported from Germany, the best from Vienna. The blocks are principally dug up by Truks and sold to the Germans, who show a wonderful amount of skill in carving animals, figures, or faces, in the shape of pipes. Any tobacconist in the city will take a photograph from an amorous young gentleman and reproduce in snow-white meerschaum the profile of his ladylove. From Germany, also, come the long cherry stemmed china bowled pipes generally affected by university students.

The dudes pipe is the French briar, that is to say, the carved and inlaid specimen, for the plain French briar is really in more universal use than any other pipe excepting the clay. Briars cost from 25 cents to $25. The expensive ones are often complete works of art, so unique in their carving and so perfect in their finish. They are sometimes inlaid with gold and silver for men who are Sybarites in smoking. Gambier briars are the best in the world and most costly.

Then there is the violet wood pipe from Australia, a sweet wood which perfumes the air while it is being smoked; the bread pipe supposed to be made of pressed bread, but in reality of meerschaum dust; the charcoal pipe, the cherry wood pipe, and any number of pipes of queer shape and eccentric fashion, made of any of the materials mentioned above. A hundred and one whims and fancies are displayed by pipe smokers, and often a warm friendship is developed for a black-colored clay or a strong-smelling briar, difficult to understand by any one who is not a true lover of the weed in the pipe.

The Cholera in Egypt.

Cable Dispatch from Cairo: The situation between here and Port Said, in one direction and Alexandria in the other, is deplorable, and scarcely aggregated. The extent of the cholera plague, owing to the governmental precautions, is not actually known, but the statements of those who escaped from the infected districts and whose very presence is shunned by almost every one, reveal a terrible state of affairs. There are scarcely enough well natives to bury the dead in some of the villages along the Mediterranean and the low Nile delta districts. Deaths are announced at many new points, the number not being stated. There is not believed to be a foreigner in the district, except a few self-sacrificing physicians who, besides risking their lives, stay under very discouraging circumstances, as they can secure remedies only with difficulties, and are met by underhand opposition by native doctors and their presence is everywhere resented by local officials.

A Hard Nigger to Kill.

Frank Cook, the negro who in a fit of jealousy shot Emma Shorres, a colored girl, at Potosi, Mo., on the 5th. and then shot himself, and subsequently eluded pursuit, was captured and taken back to Potosi. In his attempt to kill himself, after shooting the girl, he fired two bullets into his head, one of which penetrated both hemispheres of his brain. The other bullet passed through one hemisphere and both are now inside his skull. Notwithstanding these wounds, from both of which his brains oozed in considerable quantity, the negro remained in the woods from Thursday evening till Sunday morning, when he ate a very hearty meal and talked rationally and walked three miles from the place he was captured to Potosi. Physicians, however say he can't live.

At the monthly fair and races at Delano on the 7th inst., J. D. Young, proprietor of Young's hotel and president of the town council, was very seriously injured. He was trying to keep the track clear of spectators, when he was struck and run over by one of the horses. He lies in a very critical condition.

Cole's circus was ditched Saturday morning four miles west of Brainerd. Four baggage cars were smashed and one Har assistant manager, had a rib broken and severe internal injuries.

James Dwyer, a tramp hailing from Dakota, was arrested on the night of the 4th in the very act of committing larceny from the dwelling of Mr. Ring, of Shakopee who was awakened by the noise of the thief in the bedroom. The culprit was at once secured, and when shaken up very roughly some of the stolen money dropped out of him. Friday he was examined before the city justice and committed to the county jail to await the action of the district court. Thereupon Judge MacDonald issued a venire for a special grand jury, and Dwyer was arraigned and sentenced to two years in state prison.

On the 9th inst., Detective O'Connor of St. Paul went to Murdock, Swift county and arrested Earl A. Holdridge, a member of the firm carrying on the Murdock coarse grain warehouse. The warrant on which the arrest was made was taken out by Charles McIlrath of the firm of McIlrath & Gilbert, St. Paul, and charges Holdridge with giving a fraudulent warehouse receipt for 6,007 bushels of oats Jan. 2. It appears that these oats were not in the warehouse at the time, and to square matters, Holdridge tried to buy them back, and is now trying to fix up matters with the firm so that he will not be prosecuted. He expects to settle the matter. Holdridge is said to have been connected with the Y. M. C. A. in St. Paul some three years ago, and held quite a prominent position therein. He afterward married a daughter of H. D. Murdock.

A recent number of the London War City, organ of the Salvation Army, thus rejoices over a rather dubious fish that has been caught in the army's net: "A man who had been a sinner for thirty years, imprisoned five times, and had committed all the crimes in the category, is now one of us. Hallelujah!"

The New York life takes off foreign travel admirably. It represents people gathered on the coast, blindfolded, attached to a guide-book, and rushing off to Europe pell-mell.

"The tight-lacing young lady," says Richard A. Proctor, the astronomer, "is, after all, the fit partner for the male of her kind. Pinched waists and shallow brain-pans should marry and intermarry till waists contract and brains grow shallower to vanishing point." This is rather strange advice for a scientific man to give. The procreation of imbeciles will not hasten the millenium. He as well as other persons, knows that if human beings could be reared upon the principles that govern the breeding of animals, the race would be improved. The pairing of fools and invalids simply retards human advancement and adds to human misery.—Rochester Democrat.

Not long ago Mrs. Charles Baldwin, of St. Joseph, Mo., received a postal order of $22, and gave it to her husband to cash. By way of a joke he handed her only $20, exclaiming that the post office charges were $2. Thinking that this was an exorbitant fee she complained, without her husband's knowledge, to her mother who had sent the postal order, and she in turn complained at the office at which it had been drawn. The postmaster forwarded a statement of the case to Washington and the department forthwith sent Inspector Metcalf all the way to St. Joseph to investigate the case. Mr. Baldwin is now ready to acknowledge that practical jokes are a poor kind of sport.

In the annual sermon delivered before the ninety-fifth General Assembly in the Presbyterian Church in Saratoga, last month, the Rev. Dr. Johnson declared that the church was rapidly approaching calamity because of a famine of preachers. Hundreds of churches must remain pastorless because ministers could not be secured for them, and he could find no promise of relief in the colleges of the land. A statement showing what the members of the Senior class at Yale, soon to be graduated, intend to do, adds force to Dr. Johnson's assertions. Out of 149 who hope to get diplomas, only five intend to study for the ministry, while 50 will study law and 27 will go into business. In years gone by Yale sent many graduates into the theological seminaries, but now the admirably equipped theological seminary at the very doors of the university look to the west and to other eastern colleges for its students.

A local liquor law required the sum of $1,000 to be paid for a license to retail in a county in Georgia. The Ordinary of the county granted a license, receiving therefor $500 in cash and a note for $500. Suit being brought by the county upon the note the maker and indorsers set up the plea that the Ordinary had no authority to take the note, and that the consideration for the same was illegal. The Supreme Court of Georgia held that the consideration was not illegal, and that the Ordinary should have required the whole sum in cash, it being his duty to do so, yet the party applying for the license had obtained and enjoyed the [illegible]

Polk County Journal.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 12

Knute Nelson of Aldal was in the city on Tuesday.

The County Board of Equalization meets on Monday next.

Court re-convened on Tuesday with Judge Stearns presiding.

Archie McKinnon returned on Friday last from a visit to his old home in Canada.

The foundation for the Congregational church is being laid and the good work goes bravely on.

M. E. Filiatrault brought in a sample of his wheat which is over three feet high and heading out.

Mr. W. H. Foote, of Euclid, has purchased a house and lot in the city and will return to the city to reside.

Charlie Seeley has taken a short furlough and gone to Chicago, leaving Jack in charge of Seeley's Exchange until his return.

Wm. Kistenmacher and wife have been heard from after their safe arrival in Germany. They are enjoying their visit hugely.

Mr. J. L. Bailey brought in a sample of barley, on Monday that was 3½ feet in length. He has a large field of the same kind near Kittson.

Esquire Lewis was called up to the Canada house to unite in the holy bonds of wedlock, Mr. Peter O. Lewis, and Miss. Philda Thomson, all of Polk County.

The Northern Tier has changed hands twice lately. First from J. K. Arnold to Stark and Arnold and now to Stark and Kaiser. J. K. is still retained as editor-in-cheif.

Ole Bang will receive a carload of the celebrated Michel's LaCrosse bottle beer in a day or so for the wholesale agent, Thomas Ulven, who will sell it out by wholesale.

It is the general opinion that while grain is not yet seriously injured that we must have rain within a few days or it will be. Marshal and Kittson Counties caught a soaker on Wednesday and appearances indicate that we shall have rain here soon.

Alex Anderson left Fergus Falls Friday night to join his father, Michael Anderson, at Seattle, Washington Territory. Aleck expects to take up a pine claim and grow up with the country. You might say, without punning, that he goes to Seattle in Washington Territory

Mr. H. H. Hinman was relieved of about $80 and a gold watch by an enterprising burglar Sunday night. The party entered Mr. Hinmans sleeping room sometime in the night and gobbled his clothing, took it outside sifted the pockets, leaving the clothing on the streets. It was evedently the work of professionals.

Our Maple Lake Letter

The Fourth was put in in good shape. Fred Date had his big sail boat out with an organ on board, and hundreds of lesser crafts were on the water. Jack Confair opened out his new hotel with a big dance which was well attended. Altogether the day was highly enjoyed by all who participated in the festivities of the occasion.

Our Fertile Letter.

Fertile celebrated the ever glorious in good shape. It was enjoyed by hundreds, among the many were I. W. Kimberley and the Messrs Murphy, H. Budd and wife, Walter Jackson, J. H. Massey, C. Ahl, and many others. Dr. A. Nelson and S. LaDue delivered themselves of an eloquent oration each, marshals Kankle and Grodevig preserved excellent order during the day and evening. A grand dance was begun in the afternoon and lasted through out the day and evening. In the evening a fine display of fireworks was had and all united in pronouncing the afair a spleudid one.

A Sad and Fatal Accident.

On Friday morning, at about 7 o'clock Mr. J. Rudolph Chiniquy received a fatal wound by the accidental discharge of a shot gun in his own hands. Two physicians, Dr. Dampier and Dr. Gaboury, were instantly summoned who did all in their power to aid but with no avail, as the whole charge passed through the right breast almost entirely through his body carrying along bits of the clothing and wadding with the shot. Mr. Chiniquy lingered until Saturday and quietly breathed his last. On Tuesday a large concourse of people gathered at the Catholic church to pay the last sad respects to their late companion and friend and the body was conveyed to the depot to be taken to Chicago, accompanied by C. A. Chiniquy and N. F. Chiniquy and wife. Rudolph was universally liked and his presence will be missed by a large circle of friends who unite with us in extending sympathy to the bereaved relatives.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

The new school house is rapidly nearing completion, and looks magnificent.

Abe Reynolds says he has wheat on his farm which measures 24 inches in length! Who says this is not a prolific county for No. 1—wheat?

Work has commenced on the iron bridge to span the Red Lake river, near the point. The contractors have until about the middle of July to finish it.

The entire Courier force is "paralyzed this week: With a carbuncle on the neck, a fractured collar-bone and a slight attack of "brokeupativeness," we barely manage to get out this issue of Courier.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELLA Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagamie, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagees, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 26th day of April A. D. 1882 duly recorded in the in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 428 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100.) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars, ($558,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 10th day of August A. D. 1883, at two o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated June 27th, A. D. 1883.

VOL. VII. CROOKSTON, POLK COUNTY, MINNESOTA, THURSDAY, JULY 19, 1883. NO. 12

We are in receipt of a letter from Firtile which came too late for last weeks issue. Our correspondent reports that Fertile enjoyed the fourth hugely, that rain is needed, (they've had lots of it since) that Mesrss. LaDue and Gilmun are doing a big business. Right here we wish to say that we are always anxious to get items of news and request our correspondents to be sure to get their communications to us as soon as Wednesday morning so that we may be able to give due attention.

ANGUS, July 16th, 1883.

ED. JOURNAL, DEAR SIR: I notice in the JOURNAL reports of the prosperity of other towns, so I will say a word about Angus. At our town meeting last spring the voters there assembled, passed a resolution asking the town Board to declare public highways open on every section line in town, according to town laws chapter three, article three, which the Board did at their first meeting thereafter. About the first of June the town purchased a New Era Grader and procured men and teams to run it at $18.50 per day, owing to the dry and hot weather we have not made as much road as could have been done in an ordinary season, but we have been running the grader sixteen miles per day except some of the very hottest and and closest days; we have made some splendid roads, better than it is possible for that Grand Forks man to have made, who boasts of his five miles of road in ten days, for we take thirty-two furrows out of each ditch making sixty-four miles travel for each mile of road. This would compel our friend to haul the grader thirty-two miles per day which he can not do with any twelve or sixteen horses. This reminds me of the stories told of work done with gang plows, sulky plows and binders, not but that the machines would all do their work if they are pulled over the required amount of ground and the difference must be either in the quality of work done or the velocity with which the thing travels.

Crops were looking pretty dry until Friday evening when we got a good soaking rain very acceptable and doing unlimited good, but ten days sooner would have increased the yield of grain many fold.

Our church was re-organised Saturday July 7th, new officers were elected and steps taken to become in-corporated. Services are held regularly at the school house with good attendance, we have also an interesting Sabbath school.

Our store, put in here by Flint, Winchester & Co., is well stocked and well managed and would do credit to a much larger town, but we intend to grow. We are not without enjoyments. Our young folks had a party at the depot Thursday evening, a regular old fashioned dance, many of our neighbors from Brislet were down; there were 26 couples, everybody was well acquainted with everybody else and a real pleasant time they had. I hope our friends up north will give us a larger notice next time and we will give them a warmer reception.

Lest I trespass on valuable time I close for this time. "Pi."

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectater

Paul Bataglia, the Crookston furniture man was up on Saturday last making arrangements for starting a branch of his business here. He and and Mr F. C. Ashall have gone in together in the business. Mr. Ashall will build an addition to his store and run the furniture store in connection with his hardware business. One more enterprise for St. Hilaire.

Crocker & Cundy have made arrangements with Indian chief, Moosedung, for the purchase of all the fallen timber he could get out of the Red Lake and on Monday last the chief sent a messenger down to inform them that 150,000 feet of oak and pine logs were in the river, and would be here in a few days. C. & C. immediately put a force of men to work stringing a boom across the river, and have now made every arrangement for the reception of the logs. The messenger also stated that a drive consisting of about 300,000 feet of pine logs was being got ready and would be sent down in about two weeks. These logs with about 20,000,000 feet more which this firm will receive here during the year, will all be manufactured into lumber at this point. Sorsoliel & Darling will get their saw mill in running order as soom as possible and commence sawing. This is a bonanza for Crocker & Cundy and the best thing that could happen to St. Hilaire.

Emiel, the 15 year old son of Mr. Arnold Webber, living five miles south of this place, while bathing in the Red Lake River a week ago last Sunday was drowned. Diligent search was made for the body but it was not recovered until Friday afternoon last. It was taken to Crookston and buried Saturday; Rev. Page conducting the funeral services. Mr. and Mrs Webber feel almost heart broken over the loss of their son and have the heartfelt sympathy of all their friends in their berevement. Deceased was a nephew of our townsman Mr. C. C. Utzinger, who felt his loss almost as bad as his parents.

AN AMAZING EVOLUTION.

W. W. Cole as an Amusement Monopolist—His Great Scheme—Foreign Productions, Etc.

From the St. Louis Republican.

Already the carefully guarded intentions of W. W. Cole, the great circus manager, have created no little commotion in the amusement world, and the reckless, yet deliberate, manner in which he has entered upon a most extravagant project for the coming season has, for the moment, stupefied his opponents. With a Western headquarters in St. Louis, Mr. Cole (with his agents located in New York, London and Paris) has brought to bear upon his colossal entertainment all the elements that might further his interest. The most lavish outlays have been made. Among other foreign attractione, a troupe of real Bedouin Arabs has been secured, and will soon arrive in our city. These desert-born performers are quite the reverse of anything ever seen on this continent, and will appear in a series of the most remarkable acrobatic evolutions ever witnessed. They will form lofty pyramids, leap over lines of fixed bayonets, semersault over high objects, and perform various athletic feats while holding swords, cutlasses and daggers in their hands. The troupe includes male and female performers and they will also be seen in situations characteristic of the harems and desert life. In the great street pageants they will ride genuine Kalmuck camels and, thoroughbred Arabie horses. In the circus proper, three rings—side by side—and an enormous elevated theatre stage will be required to produce the multiplicity of novelties which have, recently been added. A system has been adopted whereby simultaneous acts will not conflict or detract one from the other. Russian roller skates bicycle experts, gladiatorial games and pastimes will take place on the elevated stage. A number of English and French equestrians have been engaged, and all riders will appear on bareback horses. A large number of Oriental and foreign features; the nature of which it is not policy to now make public, will be presented. Samson the gigantic elephant, whose ponderous proportions of earth, will constitute one of the leading menagerie features. A general outline of this great enterprise will be given in these columns at some future time.

A tour of the country has already been mapped out, and this colossal exhibition will appear in this city on Saturday July 21st.

LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

A Racy Sketch from Mark Twain's Latest Book.

Perhaps the best representative passage that could be selected,—since it shows its author's faculties of observation and statement, and his command of satirical phraseology, together with his characteristic mood of banter and chaff,—is the subjoined account of the homes of the wealthy citizens of the West between New Orleans and St Louis.

Every town and village along that vast stretch of double river frontage has a best dwelling, finest dwelling, mansion,—the home of its wealthiest and most conspicuous citizen. It is easy to describe it; large grassy yard, with paling fence painted white—in fair repair; brick walk from gate to door; big, square, two-story "frame" house, painted white, and porticoed like a Grecian temple—with this difference, that the imposing fluted columns and Corinthian capitals were a pathetic sham, being made of white pine and painted; iron knocker; brass door knob—discolored, for lack of polishing. Within, an uncarpeted hall, of planed boards; opening out of it a parlor, fifteen feet by fifteen—in some instances five or ten feet larger; ingrain carpet; mahohany centre table; lamp on it, with green-paper shade—standing on a gridiorn, so to speak, made of high colored yarns, by the young ladies of the house, and called a lamp-mat; several books, piled and disposed, with cast-iron exactness, according to an inherited and unchangeable plan; among them, Tupper, much pencilled; also "Friendship's Offering," and "Affection's Wreath," with their sappy inanities illustrated in die-away mezzotints; also, Ossian; "Alonzo and Melissa" maybe "Ivanhoe; also "Album" full of original "poetry" of the Thou-hast-wounded-the-spirit-that-loved-thee breed; two or three goody-goody works—"Shepherd of Sailsbury Plains," etc.; current number of the chaste and innocuous Godey's "Lady's Book," with painted fashion-plate of wax-figured women with mouths all alike—lips and eyelids the same size—each five-foot woman with a two-inch wedge sticking from under her dress and letting on to be half of her foot. Polished air-tight stove (new and deadly invention) with pipe passing through a board which closes up the discarded good old fireplace. On each end of the wooden mantel, over the fireplace, a large basket of peaches and other fruits, natural size, all done in plaster, rudely, or in wax, and painted to resemble the originals—which they don't. Over middle of mantel, engraving—Washington Crossing the Delaware; on the wall by the door, copy of it done in thunder-and-lightning crewels by one of the young ladies—work of art which would have made Washington hesitate about crossing, if he could have foreseen what advantage was going to be taken of it. Piano—kettle in disguise—with music, bound and unbound, piled on it, and on a stand near by: Battle of Prague; Bird Waltz' Arkansas Traveller; Rosin the Bow; Marseilles Hymn; On a Lone Barren Isle (St. Helena); The Last Link is Broken: She Wore a Wreath of Roses the Night when Last we Met, Go, Forget Me, Why should Sorrow o'er that Brow a Shadow Fling; Hours there were to Memory Dearer; Long, Long, Ago; Days of Absence; A Life on the Ocean Wave, A Home on the Rolling Deep, Bird at Sea; and spread open on the rack, where the plaintive singer has left it, Ro-holl on, silver moo-boon, guide the travel-ler his way, etc. Tilted pensively against the piano, a guitar—guitar capable of playing the Spanish Fandango by itself if you give it a start, Frantic work of art on the wall—pious motto, done on the premises, sometimes in colored yarns, sometimes in faded grasses—progenitor of the "God Bless our Home" of modern commerce. Framed in black mouldings on the wall, other works of art conceived and committed on the premises, by the young ladies; being grim black-and-white crayons; landscapes, mostly: lake, solitary sail-boat, petrified clouds, pre-geological trees on shore, anthracite precipice; name of criminal conspicuous in the corner. Lithograph, Napoleon crossing the Alps, Lithograph, The Grave at St. Helena. Steelplates, Trumbull's Battle of Bunker Hill, and the Sally from Gibralter, Copperplates, Moses Smitting the Rock, and Return of the Prodigal Son. In big gilt frame, slander of the family, in oil; papa holding a book ("Constitution of the United States"); guitar leaning against mamma, blue ribbons fluttering from its neck; the young ladies, as children, in slippers and scalloped pantalettes, one embracing toy horse, the other beguiling kitten with ball of yarn, and both simpering up at mamma, who simpers back. These persons all fresh raw and red—apparently skinned. Opposite in gilt frame, grandpa and grandma, at thirty and twenty-two, stiff, old-fashioned, high-collared, puff-sleeved, glaring pallidly out from a background of solid Egyptian night. Under a glass French clock dome, large bouquet of stiff flowers done in corpse-white wax. Pyramidal what-not in the corner, the shelves occupied chiefly with bric-a-brac of the period, disposed with an eye to best effect: shell, with the Lord's Prayer carved on it; another shell—of the long-oval sort, narrow, straight orifice, three inches long, running from end to end—portrait of Washington carved on it; not well done; the shell had Washington's mouth originally—artist should have built to that. These two are memorials of the long-ago bridal trip to New-Orleans and the French Market. Other bric-a-brac; Californian "specimens"—quartz, with gold wart adhering; old Guinea-gold locket, with circle of ancestral hair in it; Indian arrow-heads, of flint; pair of bead moccasins, from uncle who crossed the Plains; three "alum" baskets of various colors—being skeleton-frame of wire, clothed-on with cubes of crystallised alum in the rock-candy style—works of art which were achieved by the ladies; their doubles and duplicates to be found upon all what-nots in the land; convention of desiccated bugs and butterflies pinned to a card; painted toy-dog, seated upon bellows-attachment—drops its under jaw and squeaks when pressed upon; sugar candy rabbits—limbs and features merged together, not strongly defined; pewter presidential-campaign medal; miniature cardboard wood-sawyer, to be attached to the stove-pipe and operated by the heat; small Napoleon, done in wax; spread-open daguerreotypes of dim children, parents, cousins, aunts and friends, in all attitudes but customary ones; no templed portico at back, and manufactured landscape stretching away in the distance—that came in latter, with the photograph; all these vague figures lavishly chained and ringed—metal indicated and secured from doubt by stripes and splashes of vivid gold bronze; all of them too much combed, too much fixed up; and all of them uncomfortable in inflexible Sunday clothes of a pattern which the spectator cannot realize could ever have been in fashion; husband and wife generally grouped together—husband sitting, wife standing, with hand on his shoulder—and both preserving, all these fading years, some traceable effect of the daguerreotypist's brisk "Now smile, if you please!" Bracketed over what-not—place or special sacredness—an outrage in water-color, done by the young niece that came on a visit long ago, and died. Pity, too, for she might have repented this in time. Horse-hair chairs, horse-hair sofa which keeps sliding from under you. Window-shades of oil stuff, with milk-maids and ruined castles stencilled on them in fierce colors. Lambrequins dependent from gaudy boxings of beaten tin, gilded. Bedrooms with fancy carpets; bedsteads of the "corded" sort, with a sag in the middle, the cords needing tightening; snuffy feather-bed—not aired often enough; cane-seat chairs; splint-bottomed rocker; looking-glass on wall; school-slate size, veneered frame; inherited bureau; wash-bowl and pitcher possibly—but not certainly; brass candlestick, tallow candle, snuffers. Nothing else in the room. Not a bath-room in the house; and no visitor likely to to come along who has ever seen one. That was the residence of the principal citizen, all the way from the suburbs of New Orleans to the edge of St. Louis.

A HAPPY COMMUNITY.

How the People of an Ohio Village Lead Lives of Contentment.

From the Cleveland Herald.

About eighty miles from Cleveland and six miles south of Mineral Point, the terminus of the Valley road at the Wheeling junction of the Wheeling and Lake Erie Railroad, there is a quaint little old village known as Zoar, inhabited by a strange, frugal and industrious people, the happiest, perhaps, in the world. They know no care; nothing worries and troubles them. A large number of them never saw the outside of their beautiful home, a veritable paradise, and trouble themselves little, if any, about the turmoil and strifes of the wicked world. The colony was first founded in 1817 by Huber and Ackermann, two Germans, the former a native of Wurtemburg and the latter hailing from Bavaria. Shortly afterward, in the same year, they and a few followers formed a community and named it Zoar, because they looked upon their home as a place of refuge from the world, which they termed Sodom and Gomarrah. The first two houses which Huber and Achermann built in 1817—quaint, antique structures—are still inhabited by the descendents of the two pioneers. They are built of logs and mortor and contain but one large room, sparsely furnished. The windows are small, each containing nine panes of glass about six inches square. The roofs are covered with tiles, as are those of all the houses erected up to about 1826, when the art of tile-making died out in Zoar.

The inhabitants, who have no desire to amass wealth, work for one common end—that is, for the good of the community, which owns and controls the entire village, including thousands of the richest land in the Buckeye State. The money goes into one common treasury, the necessaries of life, including food, provisions and garments, are furnished by the village officials, consisting of three trustees and a committee of five, who are annually elected by ballot. The village contains about 300 inhabitants, which number has been the same since 1817 and never increases or decreases to any noticeable extent. There are no preachers, but all the people are devout, worshiping after the manner of the Friends. The marriage vow is held sacred and the laws are rarely broken.

Central America Antiquities.

The superb collection of antiquities brought from Mexico and Central America by Desire Charnay, has been presented to the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, by Mr. Pierre Lorillard. The prime object of the expedition, to make moulages, or casts (negative), in paper mache of the principal bas-relief and hieroglyphic inscriptions existing in the temples, palaces, etc., of the ruined cities, has been successfully accomplished. From these, plaster casts have been made in duplicate, one set for Mr. Lorillard, who has decided to present it to the Smithsonian. To these it was deemed advisable to add the spolia opima of the Charnay expedition, so that the student and the general public might be able to contemplate under one roof as diversified a collection as possible of memorials of the past in America. These casts possess the highest interest both for the artist and for the student of history. They are of the monuments which they reproduce, many of the base reliefs being ten feet in hight and six or eight feet wide. Effects of ornamentation, and even architectual effects, may be studied in these fac similes quite as well, and without any of the discomforts attending a visit to the localities themselves. Students of history, of ethnology, and anthropology, and of language will have presented to them in these monuments materials of inestimable value for their several sciences, and some one of them may prove the Champollion to read these hitherto indecipherable inscriptions, and to fathom the mystery of these ancient peoples. When the collection is duly installed in the museum, the stay-at-home traveler will be enabled to look with his own eyes upon these wonders of the semi-tropical forests of Central America, which forty years ago filled the eminent American traveler, J. L. Stephens, with admiration and astonishment, although he had previously visited the stupendous monuments of Egypt.—New York Times.

When To Bathe.

The London Lancet gives some timely hints about beginning out-of-door bathing. If the weather be chilly, it says, or there be a cold wind so that the body may be rapidly cooled at the surface while undressing, it is not safe to bathe. Under such conditions the further chill of immersion in cold water will take place at the moment when the reaction consequent upon the chill of exposure by undressing ought to occur, and this second chill will not only delay or altogether prevent the reaction, but convert the bath from a mere stimulant to a depressant, ending in the abstraction of a large amount of animal heat and congestion of the internal organs and nerve centres. The actual temperature of the water does not effect the question so much as its relative temperature as compared with that of the surrounding air. The aim must be to avoid two chills; first, from the air, and second, from the water, and to make sure that the body is in such a condition as to secure a quick reaction on emerging from the water, without relying too much on the possible effect of friction by rubbing. It will be obvious, therefore, that both weather and wind must be carefully considered before bathing is begun, and that the state of the organism as regards fatigue and the force of the circulation should also be considered, not merely as regards the general habit, but the special condition when a bath is to be taken. These precautions are eminently needful in the case of the young or weakly.

RE-INVESTIGATED.

A Remarkable Statement Fully Confirmed by Three Important Interviews.

An unusual article from the Rochester, N. Y., Democrat and Chronicle was published in this paper recently and has been the subject of much conversation both in professional circles and on the street. Apparently it caused more commotion in Rochester, as the following from the same paper shows:

Dr. J. B. Henion, who is well known not only in Rochester, but in nearly every part of America, sent an extended article to this paper, a few days since, which was duly published, detailing his remarkable experience and rescue from what seemed to be certain death. It would be impossible to enumerate the personal enquiries which have been made at our office as to the validity of the article, but they have been so numerous that further investigation of the subject was deemed an editorial necessity.

With this end in view a representative of this paper called on Dr. Henion at his residence, when the following interview occurred:

"That article of yours, doctor, has created quite a whirlwind. Are the statements about the terrible condition you were in, and the way you were rescued such as you can sustain?"

"Every one of them and many additional ones. Few people ever get so near the grave as I did and then return, and I am not surprised that the public think it marvelous. It was marvelous."

"How in the world did you, a physician, come to be brought so low?"

"By neglecting the first and most simple symptoms. I did not think I was sick. It is true I had frequent headaches; felt tired most of the time; could eat nothing one day and was ravenous the next; felt dull, indefinite pains, and my stomach was out of order, but I did not think it meant anything serious."

"But have these common ailments anything to do with the fearful Bright's disease which took so firm a hold on you?"

"Anything? Why, they are the sure indications of the first stages of that dreadful malady. The fact is, few people know or realize what ails them, and I am sorry to say that too few physicians do either."

"That is a strange statement, doctor."

"But it is a true one. The medical profession have been treating symptoms instead of diseases for years, and it is high time it ceased. We doctors have been clipping off the twigs when we should strike at the root. The symptoms I have just mentioned or any unusual action or irritation of the water channels indicate the approach of Bright's disease even more than a cough announces the coming of consumption. We do not treat the cough, but try to help the lungs. We should not waste our time trying to relieve the headache, stomach, pains about the body or other symptoms, but go directly to the kidneys, the source of most of these ailments."

"This, then, is what you meant when you said more than one-half the deaths which occur arise from Bright's disease, is it doctor?"

"Precisely. Thousands of so-called diseases are torturing people to-day, when in reality it is Bright's disease in some one of its many forms. It is a Hydra headed monster and the slightest symptoms should strike terror to every one who has them. I can look back and recall hundreds of deaths which physicians declared at the time were caused by paralysis, apoplexy, heart disease, pneumonia, malarial fever and other common complaints which I see now were caused by Bright's disease."

"And did all these cases have simple symptoms at first?"

"Every one of them, and might have been cured as I was by the timely use of the same remedy—Warner's Safe Cure. I am getting my eyes thoroughly open in this matter and think I am helping others to see the facts and their possible danger also. Why, there are no end of truths bearing on this subject. If you want to know more about it go and see Mr. Warner himself. He was sick the same as I and is the healthiest man in Rochester to-day. He has made a study of this subject and can give you more facts than I can. Go, too, and see Dr. Lattimore the chemist, at the university. If you want facts there are any quantity of them showing the alarming increase of Bright's disease, its simple and deceptive symptoms, and there is but one way by which it can be escaped."

Fully satisfied of the truth and force of the Doctor's words, the reporter bade him good day and called on Mr. Warner at his establishment on Exchange street. At first Mr. Warner was inclined to be reticent, but learning that the information desired was about the alarming increase of Bright's disease, his manner changed instantly and he spoke very earnestly:

"It is true that Bright's disease has increased wonderfully, and we find, by reliable statistics that in the past ten years its growth has been 250 per cent. Look at the prominent men it has carried off: Everett, Sumner, Chase, Wilson, Carpenter, Bishops Haven and Peck, and others. This is terrible, and shows a greater growth than that of any other known complaint. It should be plain to every one that something must be done to check this increase or there is no knowing where it may end."

"Do you think many people are afflicted with it to-day who do not realize it, Mr. Warner?"

"Hundreds of thousands. I have a striking example of this truth which has just come to my notice. A prominent professor in a New Orleans medical college was lecturing before his class on the subject of Bright's disease. He had various fluids under microscopic analysis, and was showing the students what the indications of this terrible malady were. In order to show the contrast between healthy and unhealthy fluids, he had provided a vial, the contents of which were drawn from his own person. 'And now, gentlemen,' he said, 'as we have seen the unhealthy indications, I will show you how it appears in a state of perfect health,' and he submitted his own fluid to the usual test. As he watched the results his countenance suddenly changed—his color and command both left him, and in a trembling voice he said: 'Gentlemen, I have made a painful discovery; I have Bright's disease of the kidneys,' and in less than a year he was dead."

"You believe, then, that it has no symptoms of its own and is frequently unknown even by the person who is afflicted with it?"

"It has no symptoms of its own and very often none at all. Usually no two people have the same symptoms, and frequently death is the first symptom. The slightest indication of any kidney difficulty should be enough to strike terror to any one. I know what I am talking about, for I have been through all the stages of kidney disease."

"You know of Dr. Henion's case."

"Yes, I have both read and heard of it."

"It is very wonderful, is it not?"

"A very prominent case but no more so than a great many others that have come to my notice as having been cured by the same means."

"You believe then that Bright's disease can be cured?"

"I know it can. I know it from the experience of hundreds of prominent persons who were given up to die by both their physicians and friends."

"You speak of your own experience, what was it?"

"A fearful one. I had felt languid and unfitted for business for years. But I did not know what ailed me. When, however, I found it was kidney difficulty, I thought there was little hope, and so did the doctors. I have since learned that one of the physicians of this city pointed me out to a gentleman on the street one day, saying, 'there goes a man who will be dead within a year.' I believe his words would have proven true if I had not fortunately secured and used the remedy now known as Warner's Safe Cure."

"And this caused you to manufacture it?"

"No it caused me to investigate. I went to the principal cities, saw physicians prescribing and using it and I therefore determined, as a duty I owed humanity and the suffering, to bring it within their reach and now it is known in every part of America, is sold in every drug store and has become a household necessity."

The reporter left Mr. Warner, much impressed with the earnestness and sincerity of his statements and next paid a visit to Dr. S. A. Lattimore at his residence on Prince street. Dr. Lattimore, although busily engaged upon some matters connected with the State Board of Health, of which he is one of the analysts courteously answered the questions that were propounded him.

"Did you make a chemical analysis of the case of Mr. H. H. Warner some three years ago, doctor?"

"Yes, sir."

"What did this analysis show you?"

"The presence of albumen and tube casts in great abundance."

"And what did the symptoms indicate?"

"A serious disease of the kidneys."

"Did you think Mr. Warner could recover?"

"No, sir. I did not think it possible. It was seldom, indeed, that so pronounced a case had, up to that time, ever been cured."

"Do you know anything about the remedy which cured him?"

"Yes, I have chemically analyzed it and upon critical examination, find it entirely free from any poisonous or deleterious substances."

We publish the foregoing statements in view of the commotion which the publicity of Dr. Henion's article has caused and to meet the protestations which have been made. The standing of Dr. Henion, Mr. Warner and Dr. Lattimore in the community is beyond question and the statements they make cannot for a moment be doubted. They conclusively show that Bright's disease of the kidneys is one of the most deceptive and dangerous of all diseases, that it is exceedingly common, alarmingly increasing and that it can be cured.

FLIRTING MARRIED WOMEN.

Their Follies Painted in Proper Colors.

San Francisco Argonaut.

No class of women of the beau monde do more harm than do those married women who amuse themselves by carrying on a "harmless flirtation"—a designation which is a misnomer, for no flirtation can be harmless where one of the parties to it is a married woman. There may be nothing essentially wrong in the affair; no harm may accrue either to her or to the man upon whom she exercises her powers of attraction; but her husband is made unhappy, and she becomes the subject of unpleasant comment. It is frequently said that pretty young married women are much more attractive to gentlemen than it is possible for young ladies to be. The reason assigned for that is that men can talk to them with less restraint, can adopt toward them a free-and-easy tone, which renders them agreeable companions. The truth of the matter is that men may with impunity lavish upon married women attentions which, if offered to single women, would be decidedly committal; and as society men are not often burdened with money, and are not prepared to set up establishments of their own, they avoid the society of young girls, and joining the train of some gay young matron, are contented with such grains of comfort as she sees fit to bestow upon him. It is almost incomprehensible that any man of sense should be willing to become one of this retinue, who are permitted to carry my lady's shwal, or hold her fan, in return for assiduous devotion; but they are flattered by such distinction—it makes them fashionable. No unmarried man should be blamed for carrying on a flirtation with a married woman, when she takes the initiative, but a woman should be censured who, having voluntarily exchanged the freedom of girlhood for the responsibilities of a wife, disregards her husband's claims upon her time and attention, and fritters them away in a silly flirtation with some man who, while professing ardent adoration, secretly condemns her, and perhaps ridicules her at his club. If a woman feels that she is unwilling to relinquish the attention, which, as a girl, was hers by right; that the devotion of one man cannot compensate her for that which she gives up in marrying him, she should remain unmarried; but being married, let her content herself with the admiration of her husband, and cease to desire that of other men. I do not mean to imply that because a woman is married she should be isolated, and in society relegated to the companionship of her husband. There is a certain kind of attention to which married women are entitled, and which they may receive without provoking comment. Talented, attractive women may draw around them men of intellect, welcome them to their homes, and make themselves the center of a cultivated circle; may show that they take pleasure in their society, and may accept their chivalrous attentions in a pleasant, frank, manner, without being at all flirtatious. But when married women permit men to pay them fulsom compliments, to make lovelike speeches of them, and to show them marked attention, they depart from that matronly dignity which is one of their greatest charms. It is alleged by those who seek to excuse the flirtation of married women that it is very hard for a woman who had once been a belle to do without admiration; and another excuse that perhaps the husband is lacking in devotion, is uninteresting, and so she she seeks the companionship of men who are interesting. Although a gradual diminution of affectionate attention on the part of a husband is a great grief to a wife, it does not warrant her in engaging in a flirtation as a cure for ennui. There are other more efficacious methods of dealing with recalcitrant husbands, and while a loving wife who is neglected always elicits sympathy, sympathy gives place to censure if she becomes a flirt in order to avenge her wrongs. No woman whose love for her husband is true and deep will care for the attention of other men; she may like to look well and endeavor to be bright and attractive in society, but neither by word or look will she encourage any approach to a flirtation Women who do encourage such advances have much to answer for; they not only wreck their own happiness, but they exert a pernicious influence over those with whom they come in contact, and lower all women in the opinion of men. If a young man sees that his wife's friend prefers his society to that of her husband, he reflects that were he to become a "Benedict" in his turn, very probably his wife would prefer other men to him, and he concludes that he is much happier as a bachelor, spending his evenings in the society of the wives of his friends, since he is so cordially welcomed. Married women who are flirts are often unscrupulous, and instead of being the advisers and coadjutors of young girls in society, they become their most dangerous enemies if they think that their preserves are being trespassed upon. Married women should be a power in society, they should take precedence of young girls by reason of their knowledge of the world, their savoir faire, their superior wisdom; but when they exchange the title of "mademoiselle" for that of "madame," they should make their tutelary divinity Pallas-Athene instead of Aphrodite.

A Frenchman's Vivid Impressions at the Coronation of the Czar.

Albert Wolff in the Paris Figaro.

The Emperor alone stands up; the Metropolitan still kneels between His Majesty and the Empress; upon the twelve steps of the estrade the kneeling priests form a double line which stretches away beyond even to the Holy Gate, Dominating the whole assembly the Czar stands, bearing all the insignia of the empire; near him is the imperial standard. I cannot even attempt to give my readers an idea of the real grandeur of the movement and the image of awful power which the whole figure of His Majesty symbolizes. I may well say that this power actually terrifies; for to us, men of another civilization and more modern institutions, such enormous power concentrated in the hands of any one man whether the Czar or another, must appear more terrific than astounding. It must also be observed that the Czar's stature well befits his right to appear as the incarnation of human might. He is very tall; his shoulders are huge; his features recall those of the Emporor Paul, whose portrait I saw in the Kremlin; the expression of his face is energetic without harshness; his blonde beard—deeply blonde—and blue eyes give much gentleness to the contenance and attenuate the strong materialism of the general aspect of a sovereign, who is the very image of force. The Emporor is considered one of the strongest men in all his vast empire—his is truly a herculean nature, which repeats with mirthful ease the great deeds of the strongest knights of old—twisting a horseshoe in his sinewy hands or breaking a coin between his fingers with as much facility as though it were a fragment of glass.

TUTT'S EXPECTORANT

Is composed of Herbal and Mucilaginous products, which permeate the substance of the Lungs, expectorates the acrid matter that collects in the Bronchial Tubes, and forms a soothing coating, which relieves the irritation that causes the cough. It cleanses the lungs of all impurities, strengthens them when enfeebled by disease, invigorates the circulation of the blood, and braces the nervous system. Slight colds often end in consumption. It is dangerous to neglect them. Apply the remedy promptly. A test of twenty years warrants the assertion that no remedy has ever been found that is as prompt in its effects as TUTT'S EXPECTORANT. A single dose raises the phlegm, subdues inflammation, and its use speedily cures the most obstinate cough. A pleasant cordial, children take it readily. For Croup it is invaluable and should be in every family. In 25c. and $1 Bottles.

CHASED BY WOLVES.

Or Rube Wexford's Lesson.

Rube Wexford ought to have been a happy fellow. He was certainly considered one on the day when Kate Wilde became his bride. He was the envy of every young man in the rude western hamlet where the ceremony took place, and many were the good wishes showered on the heads of the newly wedded pair for their future happiness and prosperity. Still there were those who not only insinuated, but boasted openly, that Kate had thrown herself away, and that the helpmate of her choice was unworthy the woman he had won. Kate's father and mother were particularly opposed to the match, and did all in their power to prevent it, but the girl, besides her unwavering love, possessed a determined will, which, when once aroused, carried much before it. And thus it turned out, after months of waiting and two postponements, that the wedding bells rang out (that is, the queer affair, hanging inside the door of the primitive log chapel did its best) to announce to all interested that Rube Wexford and Kate Wilde had become husband and wife. The wedding festivities, which were added to materially by a cracked violin, smoking buffalo steaks and cider, being completed, the happy pair departed for their new home, which was situated some 15 miles from the place where dwelt Kate's parents. The west, in those days, was much more sparsely settled than now, and neighbors outside the limits of the clusters of log cabins designated as villages were few and far between. When the young bride reached the habitation provided for her reception by her husband, and which was simply a rude cabin standing in the middle of a clearing, she discovered that if she wanted acquaintances it would be necessary to travel a couple of miles to make them, the nearest human being, a family named Grey, being fully that distance away. It was in the first glow of spring when she stepped over the threshold of her new home, the trees were alive with birds, flowers and young grass peeped up everywhere, and life looked blithe and gay. For all a shadow hung over her, but she refused to think of it, tried to put it from her and in the midst of the manifold duties which claimed her attention managed to almost forget it.

The shadow was this. Rube Wexford was never accounted a strictly temperate man. Indeed, there had been times before marriage when he was for days under the influence of liquor, and Kate had seen him in this state, and therefore knew fully the extent of his weakness. But the woman loved the man, and within herself resolved that his reclamation should be her duty. That success must crown her efforts she little doubted. It had been Rube's propensity for drink that caused the union to be postponed on two different occasions. Then he braced himself against the temper, and for six months no person could point the finger of reproof at him. This was an encouraging sign, and his sweetheart showed her appreciation of it by redeeming her promise and bestowing on him her heart and hand. Kate's father and mother, however, were skeptical, and placed slight faith in the theory of a man's reformation after marriage. They reasoned with and counseled their daughter, but all their advice availed nothing, and the girl had her way. After she had left home, the old couple sat and talked the marriage over. Both agreed that no good would ensue from it, and the father finished by saying.

"Wife, the girl will come back to us, be sure. God grant that we can give her shelter and food when she does return."

Spring passed by, and summer also, but the old man's words were not fulfilled. Occasionally Kate visited the old folks, but she never had complaints to make of her husband's conduct, and only spoke well and hopefully of him. But there was a shadow over her face a cloud upon her brow, and watchful eyes began to suspect. Then the truth came out. Rube Wexford had gone back to his former ways. Scarcely was the wedding day a month behind when the demon waked within him, the appetite for drink grew stronger than ever, and the man succumbed. Kate realized now, for the first time, the task which she had set herself. She went to work patiently with tender words, wise counsels and unflagging love. The only returns were promises made and broken over and over again, until the wife's heart grew sick, and she looked forward to a future of blighted hopes. It seemed as if heaven had never made a weaker man than Rube Wexford. Sometimes he remained at home for days, worked on the clearing which had been transformed into a farm, and things went smoothly. But just as soon as Kates' face began to grow cheerful, the tempter appeared again, and all her bright hopes were dashed to the earth. One thing she had to be thankful for, her husband in his moods of intoxication kept away from the hamlet where dwelt her parents, so that her disgrace was less than it might have been. He generally visited a place five miles beyond his own cabin, kept by a desolute wretch named Washburn. Here a crowd of worthies assembled around the fire, anecdotes were repeated, rough songs were sung, and bad whisky imbibed until the whole party were in a state of intoxication, when the circle would break up, and Kate's husband would return to her in a condition which made her blood run cold.

Autumn drifted away, the crops had been gathered in, and all the indications pointed to an early and severe winter. Rube's sprees continued. No wind was to cold, no snow too deep to keep him from Washburn's. One evening in December he took down his leggins and gun from the pegs where they hung, and was preparing to go out. Kate went to him, and said:

"Rube, you must not leave me to-night. Give in to me this time and stay at home."

"I am only going for a jaunt," he replied. "I'll be back soon."

"No, you are going to Washburn's. To-night you will, you must gratify me. I am afraid to remain here alone."

"Afraid?" he answered. Such a thing as fear was almost unknown to Kate Wilde.

She clasped her arms around his neck, and whispered into his ear, her cheek flushing brightly, then she sat down in the rocker, and cried as if her heart would break. Rube stood the gun in the corner, threw aside the leggins, and cried, too.

The next morning when the winter sun beamed upon the cabin, the little log shelter held three souls instead of two. A wee stranger had come in the night, a bright-eyed baby girl. Her weak cry seemed to move all the better part of the husband's nature, and his wife looked on with new born confidence in her face. After a week when Kate was able to sit up, Rube went to relate the happy event to the grandparents. It was the first time he had visited them for some months. Very early in the morning he started, and when the afternoon shadows began to lengthen, Kate looked up eagerly for his return. It was toward daybreak when he appeared, his hands and feet almost frozen and his senses stupefied by liquor. The wife's new hopes were destined to be short lived. Freshly made promises marked the morrow, but days went by only to see them unfulfilled. Now, there was a new torture. Rube had forsaken Washburn's and made his visits to Pineville instead, where Kate's father and mother lived. It was almost more than the woman's nature could bear to know that her parents were the frequent witnesses of her husband's disgrace. This was a sort of thing which she could not and would not long brook.

Little Kate, the baby, was a month old to a day when Rube made preparations one morning for a trip to Pineville. Kate looked on silently for a few moments, and then said:

"Where are you going?"

"Only to Pineville."

"What for?"

"To see about some powder and stuff."

"That is untrue. You are going to spend the day with worthless companions, and you will come back stupid with liquor. Rube, listen to me. I have stood all which it is possible for me to endure. I have prayed and entreated you to abandon a habit which has disgraced us both. My pleadings have brought nothing. I cannot and will not have our child grow up to know a father who is a drunkard. If you refuse to stay at home, I have said my last say. Go to Pineville if you insist on doing so, but if you are not here sober by sunset, I shall go with the baby to father's, and in this house I will never set foot again."

"That's all talk," Rube answered in a rough joking and half serious fashion. "Why, its 15 miles to Pineville."

"No matter," was the firm rejoinder. "I will make the start if the child and I freeze to death by the way."

"Look out for wolves," Rube laughed again. "There have been half a dozen seen here lately. It has been a hard winter for them, and they're almost starved."

"Wolves or no wolves," muttered Kate, "I'll go."

Rube hung about the house uneasily for an hour or so, then silently rigged himself out, leggins, buffalo coat, gun and all. Kate worked away and said never a word. He opened the door, and without looking back remarked:

"I'll be here by sunset."

"See that you are," was the reply. "If you come here late the house will be empty."

The wife watched his form across the clearing and saw it disappear in the heavy timber which circled the cabin. She turned to her household duties, but had no heart for them. Well she knew that Rube Wexford would break his last promise, as he had broken other's before it. If so he must abide by the result. She was determined.

The day went by at a snail's pace, and the afternoon seemed never ending. Kate fondled the baby, listened to her crow and cry, and fed her a dozen times. Then she prepared supper, and sunset came when it was completed. But it brought no Rube. Another hour and still he was absent. So the moments passed until the clock struck ten. The baby was fast asleep. Kate rose from a chair at the cradle's side, a look of firm determination on her face, and opening the cabin door, peered across the clearing. Not a soul was visible. She closed the door, went to the chest, and took from it a pair of old-fashioned skates whose steel runners gleamed in the firelight. She laid them ready for use and proceeded to wrap herself as warmly as possible. Then she bundled the baby in the same manner, lifted her tenderly in her arms, and with the skates slung over her shoulder started across the clearing. After reaching the timber she left the beaten path and made for the river. It was coated heavily with ice, and the strong winds had blown it almost entirely free from snow, leaving a nearly naked surface. Kate laid the baby down for a few moments while she fastened on the skates. Then she lifted her burden once more and started for Pineville—fifteen miles away. The moon shone brightly; she was a wonderfully rapid skater, and she knew no slightest suspicion of fear.

Rube Wexford sat near the warm fire which was surrounded by a dozen men beside himself. He had been there for hours listening to anecdotes of hunter's lives, even adding to the general fund some of his own experiences, but though his companions coaxed and persuaded they could not prevail upon him to taste liquor. This was something so entirely new that many a laugh and joke was had at his expense. He answered all persuasions to imbibe in the same way, saying only: "Not to-day, boys; not to-day.'

When sunset came he was still in his seat. He wanted to go home, wanted to keep his promise, but he thought he would wait awhile and start later, so that it would not look to Kate too much as if he were giving in. So thinking he went to a quiet corner by himself, and had not been there long before he fell asleep It was 11 o'clock when he awoke with a start, and said hurriedly;

"What is it Kate?"

A loud roar of laughter brought him to his senses, and a rough voice cried:

"Rube, guess you have been dreaming!"

"Yes," he replied foolishly; "I thought my wife was calling me."

He glanced at the clock and said:

"Boys, I must go."

"Have something before you leave," was the general cry.

"No, no, not to-night."

Then he was gone, his conscience smote him as he crudged through the snow. It would be after two o'clock when he reached home. One thing consoled him somewhat; he was sober. But would Kate be in the cabin when he returned? Of course, she must be. Nothing short of madness could tempt her to keep the rash vow she made in the morning. So thought Rube. This was because he was incapable of estimating the great suffering which he had caused his wife. On, on he went until through the stillness of the night was borne to his ears the sound of falling waters. It proceeded from a spot which marked the half way between Pineville and his own home, and was caused by the river tumbling down a steep descent of 15 to 20 feet of rugged rocks. His road at this point lay close to the river bank, and soon he was in full view of the cascade. As he passed it he noticed with a sort of shudder how cold and dark the water looked as it tumbled down. For 30 feet above the falls there was no ice. It broke off abruptly, and the current rushed from beneath with terrible velocity. Beyond in the moonlight glistened an unbroken surface of clear ice for fully half a mile before there was a bend in the river's bank. The sight was an old one to Rube, and he paid little heed to it, but stalked on silently, still thinking of Kate and wondering if the cabin would be tenantless. Suddenly he stood stock still and listened. Many an ear would have heard nothing, but the sound of rushing waters. Rube's acute and practised hearing detected something more, and he felt instinctively for his ammunition and looked to the priming of his rifle. Then from a distance the sound came again—a peculiar cry, followed by another and another, until they ended in a wild chorus of unearthly yells. Rube muttered to himself one word—wolves—and strained his eyes in the direction of the curve in the river's edge. The cry proceeded from that direction and grew louder every instant. Before he could decide on a plan of action there shot out from the bend in the river what looked to him like a woman carrying a bundle and skating for dear life. She strained every nerve, but never once cried out. Next came a wolf, followed rapidly by others, which swelled the pack to a dozen, all ravenous, yelping, snarling and gaining closely on their prey. Rube raised his rifle, fired and began to load as he had never loaded before. The cries came nearer and nearer. Great God! the wolves were upon the woman! It seemed as if no earthly hope could save her, when, quick as an arrow from a bow, she swerved to one side, the maddeded brutes slid forward on their hind legs, and she had gained a few steps. Again she flew onward, and again she tried the ruse of swerving aside, the man on the bank in the meantime firing rapidly, and picking off wolf by wolf. A fresh danger arose. The woman evidently did not see the abrupt break in the ice above the falls and the dark swift current which lay beyond. Perhaps she was too frightened to hear the rushing waters. On she went, making straight for the falls, the wolves almost on her heels, and the man's voice crying in terrified accents, as he dropped on his knees in the snow.

"Kate! Kate! My God, save her!"

The woman was on the brink of the ice, when she made a sudden sweep to one side. Nearly the entire pack unable to check their mad flight, plunged into the water which carried them over the rocks, and Kate Wexford was flying toward the river bank, where she fell helpless in the snow, her babe in her arms, while Rube's rifle frightened the remainder of her pursuers. It was some time before she could answer her husband's voice. When strength enabled her to do so, she rose feebly in the snow, her resolution to go to her father as strong as ever. Rube took her hand, knelt down and said:

"Kate bear with me for the last time. As God is my judge, I shall never again taste liquor. This night has taught me a lesson which I cannot forget."

Kate believed him and accepted his promise. Then they started for Pineville, Rube carrying the baby and more than half carrying his wife. When they arrived there, Kate told her parents she had been dying to show them the baby, and taking advantage of the moonlight night, had made the journey on skates.

Rube kept his vow, the roses bloomed again to Kate's cheeks, and to-day a happy family of boys and girls feel no touch of shame as they look up with pride to their father.—From the New York Mercury.

Story With a Great Deal of Life in It.

Washington Correspondence Philadelphia Record.

The departments were just beginning to disgorge the great slice of humanity that they had swallowed in the morning. I was standing by one of the great piles as the men and women began to come out slowly at the first. The first two or three, warned by experience, had umbrellas, under which they were jogging slowly home at a clerkly gait. The fourth was a woman in widow's clothing—rather shabby clothing, which had been worn a long time. She was thin, shrunken, gray and pale, and seemed broken up with a weight of bad years—a sad memory of better days. The carriage of the secretary was rolling to and fro before the big entrance of the building. His gray-whiskered colored coachman with difficulty restrained his blooded horses. The secretary was signing his name on a great many different documents in his lofty velvety office. He might be out in a minute. He might not be out for an hour. Just as the ghostly widow came slowly down the big steps the fine old coachman turned his prancing pair toward the entrance. The poor old gentlewoman came down to the sidewalk with an evident difficulty, which spoke of rheumatism. She was perplexed and puzzled by the unexpected rain-storm. She had no umbrella, and I don't believe she had car-fare. The black angel on the secretary's carriage spied her as she stood in the pouring rain, and recognized under all time's disguises the features her fashionable friends had not seen for years. It's wonderful what sharp eyes these good old colored "uncles" and "mommies" have. He drove up to the curb at once, and leaning over on his perch invited the poor puzzled woman to get in the Secretary's carriage and ride home. Without a thought of the consequences to the faithful old fool on the box she murmured her address, fortunately near at hand, and sank back luxuriously on the soft cushions of the carriage. Taking all the risks, the fine old fellow drove carefully yet quickly to the shabby boarding house, and was back long before the Secretary was ready for him. I would never have known, had the loyal old servant not told me, that the widow's husband was a General who was famous when the Secretary was unknown, although I could have been quite sure that old Thomas drove her carriage when she had one.

Mind Reading in England.

The cable recently reported that Bishop, the mind reader, at Exeter Hall, had read the number of the £1,000 note which Labouchere put in an envelope and agreed to give to a public charity if Bishop succeeded in reading it. The report of this success was not strictly accurate. Labouchere and the note were not at the meeting, but a £5 note was finally put into an envelope by some one in the hall and the number of it confided to Colonel Statham. Bishop drew five lines upon the blackboard to make spaces for the figures. Then he blindfolded himself, grasped a piece of chalk, and after a slight touch upon the colonel, put down the figures in the following order: 6|6|8|9|4. Before the last figure he hesitated, clutched Colonel Statham's hand and then wrote down "4." The impassive countenance of the colonel did not tell whether Mr. Bishop had succeeded or failed. "I have two guesses," he said, "by the terms of Mr. Labouchere's challenge. Have I read the number rightly?" Statham handed the note to the chairman. Mr. Bishop had won his wager, and the meeting burst into enthusiastic cheering again and again. Outside a great crowd was waiting to see the balloon, which was to announce the success or failure of the test. As it mounted displaying not the red color of failure, but the white light of success, the crowd cheered. Inside Mr. Bishop said: "I appeal to this audience of 3,000 English men to demand of Mr. Henry Labouchere that he shall hand over to the Victoria hospital at Chelsea the $1,000 he offered to stake that I could not read the note. I have met his challenge on every point. Will you demand the money?" A great shout of assent, loud and continued cheering mingled with a few cries of "No." brought the meeting to a close. Col. Statham said that when Mr. Bishop reached the last figure he (Statham) forgot whether it was four or nothing. It was when he was trying to recall the figure that he hesitated and grasped his hand. He then decided for the four, which Mr. Bishop then wrote down.

Connecticut is rapidly advancing in the cultivation of the oyster. No less than 90,000 acres are said to be devoted to the raising of that delicious crustacean. The business is also large. Thirty steamers and many sailing vessels are engaged in the traffic.

FIELD AND FARM.

Farming Brevities.

A fruit-grower says it is a good plan to trim trees high and pasture orchards with sheep. He prefers it to plowing or mulching.

Blocks of wood two inches square, painted red, are twisted into the upper strand of barbed wire fence as danger signals to farm stock.

President McCann according to the Elmira Husbandman, once tried salt and ashes put on the hills to keep cut-worms from attacking the plants. The salt made the young corn yellow and sickly in appearance; it took several weeks to get good color again; while the application made no difference, so far as cut-worms were concerned.

In the vegetable garden reserve a few stout, healthy plants for seed. Every farmer can just as well raise a variety of seeds as to buy them. Gather them in paper bags, and label before storing away. A few dollars may be saved every year in this way, and fresh seed insured.

Small evergreens, or in fact any kind of trees, may be moved at any time with care to disturb the roots as little as possible and to keep them well supplied with water. May and June and September are perhaps the best months to move evergreens.

There is no better way of preserving eggs than liming them. This is done by slaking some lime and adding some water as if to make whitewash. Then pour off the clear liquid into a vessel and put the eggs in it. When filled cover with a piece of cotton closely upon the eggs and put an inch in depth of the thick lime on the cloth; keep this covered with water. In a cool place eggs may be kept well several months in this way.

Fashion Notes.

The fanchon is the bonnet of high fashion in New York.

Ashes of roses, or, as it is now called, old rose, is a matchless color for the toilet of a woman no longer young.

A gray bonnet looks well with almost any dress except a brown one. You can make the trimmings match the color of your costume. Gold thistles and gold lace look well on a gray bonnet.

The prettiest shade for gloves to be worn with telegraph blue is pale mastic or Suede. Black gloves are no longer fashionable with colored toilets.

The empress of Russia wore a dress at the Moscow ball of straw-colored satin and crape, with wheat ears embroidered in silver. Her dress for the ball of the nobility, though of white satin and silver opened over a petticoat of crape strewn with roses and narcissi. On entering Moscow she wore straw-colored crape; and at the fete given by that city she appeared in green china crape, with sash and bows of pink moire and bonnet of pink velvet. Crape, too, entered into the composition of the beautiful Louis XVI costume of tea-rose satin, the front of the dress being of pink crape and satin looped up with feathers and pearl acorns.

Black was a uniform for so long that it is rather curious to see it combined with the art reds or a dull shade of yellow, and to see how vivid an effect is produced by a lining, a group of feathers, or even a bunch of roses, upon a black costume. The value of yellow in bringing out other colors is beginning to be well understood, and nothing prettier can be imagined for a spring costume than an electric blue surah with glimpses of gold in the lining and a bunch of buttercups in the belt.

A remarkably pretty dress for a girl of 10 is of peckock blue satin over a white silk petticoat, and is made with a deep vest shirred deeply to a point, and a long loose jacket, the edge of which is embroidered in a floral design in colors; the skirt has fine narrow pleated flounces, each edged with the same embroidery, the neck and sleeves having a trimming to correspond, and being finished off with handsome French lace.

A most bewitching dress for a boy of three or four is of deep crimson sateen, cut low in the neck, and having a pleated guipure. It is trimmed with flouncings of silk embroidery, and narrow pleating run the whole length of the little garment. A broad sash folded in three confines it a little below the waist, and is fastened with a buckle at one side.

The most stylish costumes, in spite of the fact that combinations are in vogue, are those en suit, dress, mantle and bonnet being all one color and frequently of one material, or the headwear may be either of white or black lace, without any color in the trimming. Capote bonnets retain the favor of the fashionable world.

A Two Minute Sermon to Young Ladies.

Ladies—caged birds of beautiful plumage, but sickly looks; pale pets of the parlor, who vegetate in unhealthy atmosphere, like the potato germinating in a dark cellar—why do you not go into the open air and warm sunshine, and add lustre to your eyes, bloom to your cheeks, elasticity to your steps and vigor to your frames? Take exercise; run up the hill on a wager, and down again for fun; roam the fields, climb the fences leap the ditches, wade the brooks, and after a day of exhilarating exercise and unrestrained liberty go home with an appetite acquired by healthy enjoyment. The beautiful and blooming young lady—rosy-cheeked and bright-eyed—who can darn a stocking, mend her own frock, command a regiment of pots and kettles, and be a lady when required, is a girl that young men are in quest of for a wife. But you pining, screwed up, wasp-waisted, doll-dressed, consumption-mortgaged, music murdering, novel devouring daughters of fashion and idleness, you are no more fit for matrimony than a pullet is to look after a brood of fourteen chickens. The truth is, my dear girls, you want less fashionable restraint and more liberty of action more kitchen and less parlor; more leg-exercise and less sofa; more frankness and less mock modesty. Loosen your waist-strings and breathe pure atmosphere, and become something as good and beautiful as nature designed.

Variety and Fashion in Dress.

Variety is the salt of life; the prettiest colors and most graceful shapes, if seen continually and in masses, will weary the eye. The reason why fashions change so rapidly now is because they at once spread through every stratum of society, and become deteriorated and common. But even this ought not to goad us on in a wild race of senseless and sometimes ugly experiments.

Be plain in dress and sober in thy diet is advice on the side of which it is safe to err, and the excessive craving for something new is often bred by idleness. When the mind is occupied, outside objects assume their true value. What was beautiful yesterday is beautiful today, and remains so until some new necessity springs up to replace it: We ought ever to remember that repose of mind and body is a paramount charm; repose of mind is fascinating, repose of body is dignified; neither can exist without complete comfort and fitness in dress. It is everybody's duty to appear as nice-looking as possible.

Still to be neat, still to be drest
As you were going to the feast.

We rarely catch a sight of ourselves in the looking-glass, but others are constantly obliged to see us. We bestow care and thought upon ourselves? A little thought, a little knowledge and a little common sense will help us far more than wasting time, money and artifice. The smallest thing of beauty is a joy forever; beauty elevates our thoughts and lightens our troubles, and when brought up to it our children's minds take the impress, and are guided by a fitting sense of form and color, and learn easily to distinguish and appreciate what is good in art.—Lady Paget in the Nineteenth Century.

The Love Of The Beautiful.

Place a young girl under the care of a kind-hearted, graceful woman and she unconsciously to herself grows to a graceful lady. Place a boy in the establishment of a thorough-going, straight-forward business man, and the boy becomes a self-reliant, practical business man. Children are susceptible creatures, and circumstances, scenes and actions always impress them. As you influence them, not by arbitrary rules, not by stern example alone, but in the thousand other ways that speak through bright scenes, soft utterance and pretty pictures, so will they grow. Teach your children then to love the beautiful. Give them a corner in the garden for flowers, encourage them to put in shape the hanging baskets, allow them to have their favorite trees, lead them to wander in the prettiest wood lots, show them where they can best view the sun-set, rouse them in the morning, but with the enthusiastic "see the beautiful sun-rise," buy for them pretty pictures, and encourage them to decorate their rooms, each in his or her childish way. The instinct is in them, Give them an inch and they will go a mile. Allow them the privilege and they will make your homes beautiful.

White Clover

There is wonderful conversation of ways and means in nature. It has been several years since there was as much white clover seen as there is this season. For the past three or four years there has been but very little of it, in fact it has scarcely been noticeable for some seasons back. This year there is a large amount of it. The query is, where did it all come from? or rather where did the seed come from? In many fields and gardens that have been regularly cultivated for a long time and where no white clover was seen recently the ground is well set with the plant. Do the seeds remain in the ground uninjured and ready to grow under favorable circumstances all this time? It would appear so, thus showing the conservative powers of nature in preserving such small seeds. The seeds of white clover are not much larger than grains of gunpowder, and it is a marvel how they are preserved, and held in readiness to sprout and grow where the proper conditions are supplied. There is no other way to account for the appearance at irregular intervals of an abundant growth of the plant. No care is taken to preserve or propagate the white clover, and yet it comes to the front whenever the season suits it. This fact ought to give one some idea of the necessity of destroying the seeds of foul weeds, as rag weed, ox-eye daisy moth mullen and others. If the farmer does not see to destroying them nature will see to their preservation, and will send them out to plague the careless farmer in unexpected ways, times and places.

Agricultural Implements of the South.

The south seems slow in introducing improved agricultural implements. Farm labor is much cheaper there than it is here at the north, and there seems a disposition to adhere to old methods. But southern farmers, who yet essay to cultivate large areas, are forced, in some degree, to adopt modern reapers, separators, improved plows, &c. The utility of these economic implements will become more and more evident as they are introduced and used. Our great northern manufacturers are demonstrating to the southern farmer the expediency of using their wares, and in Atlanta, Chatanooga and other cities there are even now establishments turning out farming machinery. The Southern Cultivator, of Atlanta, remarks: "Harvesting wheat and oats, without neglecting other crops, has always been a troublesome problem with southern farmers. Now that reapers have been greatly perfected, the trouble is decidedly less. Those planting on a large scale can run reapers of their own; those who have only a few acres can get them cut by persons who make reaping a business." Thus our southern brethren are fitting themselves to the situation, and as the south is now, as it was ever destined to be, the agricultural portion of the Union par excellence, only a few years will elapse before southern agriculture will equal, if not surpass, that of the North in most respects.

Origin of State Fairs.

The present system of fairs and cattle shows originated with Elkanah Watson, an Albany merchant, about 1810. His application to Boston for guarantee funds was met by ex-President Adams with a terse rebuff: "You will get no aid from Boston. Commerce, literature, theology, medicine, the university politics are all against you." Nevertheless, the more liberal legislature of New York in 1819 appropriated $10,000 a year for six years, to be divided among its counties for the encouragement of agriculture and manufactures. In 1818, several months before the passage of this act, several of the most prominent citizens of Washington county met in the court-house at Sandy Hill and organized a county agricultural society. The first recorded fair was held at Salem in 1822, with entries for premiums, a plowing match, "plowmen in white frocks," and an address delivered in the church. Fairs on a less scale had been held every year before this in Argyle, Greenwich, Hebron, Granville, Whitehall and Kinsbury. The prizes were small and records scanty. The whole awards numbered scarely 100.

A Bear's Paw in Hot Beans.

I was pleased with an anecdote about a party of young men who once went hunting up a California ravine. At night they sat around their fire watching the boiling of a mess of beans, when a bear suddenly joined the circle, whipped the cover off the pot, and, without so much as by your leave, thrust his paw into the seething supper. Roaring with pain and astonishment, he as quickly drew it out again, overturned the pot with one vigorous blow, and throwing the hot beans into the young men's faces, lumbered off gowling into the darkness. What the young men did for supper I never heard.—Correspondence New York Tribune.

Things in General.

A simple and inexpensive jail is that belonging to Naples County, Idaho. It is a hole in the ground ten feet deep, into which the prisoner is dropped, and out of which he cannot climb, as the hole is larger at the bottom than at the top. When the prisoner is wanted the guards drop a line and pull him up on it.

Tobacco caddies, or plug tobacco boxes, are made almost entirely of sycamore throughout the country, and in Boston about 300,000 feet were used for this purpose last year. This wood is valuable for this purpose, as it will not impart any smell or taste to the tobacco, and as it will not absorb moisture readily. This appears to be about the only use which can be made of sycamore lumber, which has the very serious defect of wrapping badly.

Prof. Young, of Princeton College thus illustrates the distance from the earth to the sun: "Take a railroad from the earth to the sun, with a train running forty miles an hour without stops, and it would take about two hundred and sixty-five years and a little over to make the journey." He estimated the fare, at a cent a mile, to be nine hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

Marshal, Texas is excited over the filing of a claim by a Mr. Brown for seventy-six acres of land, situated in the principal part of the city. The property includes several business houses and the whole Texas Pacific Railroad shops, yard, and depots. The whole amount involved is worth over half a million of dollars. His claim has some prospects of being gained, as his mother willed away the property after his father's death, and he claimed the right of a minor.

When the New Orleans military company were in Boston they were taken on a steamboat excursion by the city officials. There were no invitations to "rounders" and "heelers," and a failure to provide sufficient police force on board to keep these roughs in subjection. The tables were spread in the grand saloon, and the military were in line, under escort, passing through the gangway, when the politicians made an irresistible rush by the procession and surrounded the tables before the committee had time to seat the guests. There was not force enough at hand to eject this mob of a thousand or more. An orgie followed. The wines were drunk by gobbletfuls, and even whisky by brimming tumblers. The mortification of the entertainers may be imagined. They had to individually call their guests aside, try to explain, and provide for them informally and on the sly.

There is to be a narrow-gauge railroad from North Conway, N. H., up the steep summit of Mount Kearsarge. The summit of that peak is 2,760 feet above the level of North Conway, itself an elevated mountain town. And it is very steep and difficult to climb on horseback or on foot. It is too steep, probably, at one part of the ascent, for railroading—even for cogwheel railroading; and the projected road up Mount Kearsarge is to be like an ordinary traction railroad except in two particulars; it will be but two feet wide, and it will wind around and around the mountain, making a total journey of nearly fifteen miles and a gradual rise in this spiral ascent. This rise, it is calculated by the projector, will be but 200 feet to the mile.

The commissioner of patents, in a decision just announced says: "He who uses reasonable dilligence and first reduces an invention to practice embodying it in practical form, must be regarded as the first inventer, and entitled to a patent as against one who, although prior in time in making it, by negligence allows it to remain unknown. Where inventors withhold their inventions and confer no benefits upon the public there is no reason why protection should be afforded them if other and more diligent inventors produce the same thing and do confer such benefits. The rule is well established, that an applicant cannot have a patent for that which has been patented to another, unless he shall make out such a case as would defeat the patent."

Although but little is heard of the republic of Liberia it appears to be making substantial progress and promises to be an agent of great good to the native Africans. Two negro professors, Mr. Stewart and Mr. Browne, recently made an appeal in Exeter Hall, London, in behalf of the College of Liberia, which was founded in 1863, with a view to the higher education of the colored inhabitants of Liberia, and the civilization and evangelization of the native tribes of Western Africa. The college is about to be removed from the coast to the interior, in order to secure land for cultivation and industrial purposes, that technical instruction may be given, and to be in the midst of the native tribes, whose chiefs desire their children to be educated. Prof. Stewart claimed that Liberia was making great progress, citing as one fact that the export of coffee, once only $2000 pounds a year, is now 2000 pounds per day.

The Summer Hotel.

You are the landlord of Big View hotel?

I have that honor.

And is your hotel well situated?

Delightfully; its surroundings are unsurpassed. They comprise the rugged mountain, the smiling valley, the cool, sequestered forest, the daisy-dimpled field, broad, glassy lake, gently flowing river and babbling brook.

And the views?

Exquisite. From the broad veranda can be seen the giant hills of New Hampshire, the Catskills, the Appalachian range, the far-famed Rockies and the Mexican Cordilleras, while the horizon is marked with the outlines of Hecla, Vesuvius and sacred Fusiyama; the Adirondacks are spread before the delighted beholder, the Hudson, the Mississippi and the Yangtse Kiang are like silver bands on the landscape, and the Falls of Niagara, with their ceaseless roar, can be easily descried by the unaided vision.

And the facilities—

The facilities for boating, bathing, fishing and shooting are unsurpassed. Noble lakes surround the house on three sides, and the fourth is white with the creamy surf of the broad Atlantic, which dashes upon the clean, sandy beach beneath your very feet. The lake and ocean has each its noble fleet of white-winged cruisers, not to speak of row-boats of every name and variety. The waters are swarming with the finny tribe, eager for the fisherman's hook, and trout, pickeral, salmon, hornpouts, bass, catfish, sharks, whales, and minnows are the abundant reward for the angler's pleasant ten. Then the water is always just right for bathing, and its temperature warranted to suit all who cleave its life-giving waves. Upon every tree the sportsman sees birds of diverse plumage awaiting the pop of his rifle. In short, it is the sportsman's paradise.

And the table?"

The tables are furnished with all the delicacies the market affords. Vegetables fresh from their cans and milk direct from the city are served daily, and the steak is rendered tender and pliant to the tired jaw of the denizen of the city by an athlete hired for this express purpose at an enormous expense.

Is the house guarded against accident in case of fire?

Admirably.

And the ventilation?

Perfect.

Are there any other attractions?

There are thousands. The drives, the walks, the sails are inexaustible, both in their diversity and their charming picturesqueness. Beauty is upon every side; nowhere has nature been so lavish of her multiform charms.

Well, then, I think I won't go. I fear I should be getting too much for my money. If you know of a hotel where there is nothing particular to be seen, where there are no facilities for boating, bathing, fishing and hunting, where no attention is given to ventilation, where there are no precautions against fire and where fare consists of corned pork, cabbage, cream tartar biscuits, and very weak tea, I should be happy to be informed of its whereabouts. I will go there at once and stay all summer. I long for something to break the monotony of former years.—Boston Transcript.

People We Talk About.

M. Victor Hugo, who is now a hale old man, rides every afternoon on the top of an omnibus through Paris. He likes to view the city and to converse with fellow passengers. A few years ago he presented about $2000 as a New Year's gift among the omnibus conductors.

A Georgia merchant tells a story of a fellow tradesman who one day took a Bible down from a shelf and extracted $1500 from between the leaves. "Are you not afraid to keep your money in such an exposed place?" he was asked. "Oh, no," was the reply, "it is safer in that Bible than any bank for there ain't one man in a thousand in Madison county ever looks into a book of that kind."

An enthusiastic correspondent of the Charleston News, in describing the reception in Hartford of the Charleston Light Infantry, says: I do not exaggerate when I say that the southern impulsive hospitality of which everybody here speaks so glowingly, is ice when compared with the warm, impulsive and generous hospitality of those New Englanders.

Mrs. Garfield, the widow of the late president, who has been visiting at the house of her brother-in-law, Mr. Rockwell, in Morrisania, near New York, in company with her daughter Mollie, is now at Saratoga Springs, where with her two sons and daughter, she will spend a portion of the summer. Mrs. Garfield is reported in excellent health.

The late Winthrop Hillyer, who founded the art gallery of the Smith College for Women at Northampton, also left $50,000 for its endowment. The fact was announced to the public at the formal opening of the gallery. The building cost $23,976, while pictures have been added by other donors, in many cases by artists who gave their own works.

Russell Sage is said to be the meanest man in New York. He has a fortune estimated between $20,000,000 and $30,000,000, yet is so miserly that he walks rather than pay car fare, and eats free lunches rather than pay for his dinner. But then a good many do that who are not worth a cent, and no one thinks of calling them mean.

A Rev. Mr. Caine preached for a congregation at Morrisville, Pa., for four years and during all that time he received only $800 for his services. He managed to live and had strength enough left to resign and tell the congregation what he thought of them in a farewell sermon. The pulpit is vacant and offers an opening for some minister who desires to labor for love and can control his appetite.

There are few men living whom the queen of England has so much delighted to honor as Lord Dufferin, who is now to wear the decoration of the order of the Garter and thus subscribe to his name the initials K. G. in addition to the three sets—K. P., G. C. M. G., and K. C. B.—with which he has already been honored. He started in life as a simple Irish baron, but obtained a peerage of the United Kingdom at the age of twenty-three. Since 1850 he has received no less than seventeen distinct appointments or titles—more than one every other year.

The papers have reported that Father Hyacinthe is about to visit the United States again. This a mistake. Mr. and Mrs. Loyson have long desired to cross the Atlantic once more, and they even engaged their passage on one occasion, but the important work in Europe will prevent the realization of their wishes for some time to come.

The London World says that the story that the unfortunate Charlotte, widow of the Emperor Maximilian, had been "sent to end her days in a madhouse" in Belgium, where she is "rigorously secluded," being allowed to see no one but two ladies of the court of Laedon, is simply malevolent nonsense. The Empress Charlotte is not, and never has been, "rigorously secluded," and every one in Belgium knows the sisterly affection shown to her by the queen. Her Belgic majesty visits the empress at the Chateau de Bonchout at least three times a week regularly, whatever may be the weather; and so far from being seen but by two persons, she is surrounded by ladies of honor and a household quite regal in its number.

Prince Bismarck's Ailments.

Perhaps no one in all Europe is more deserving of pity, at present, than Prince Bismarck. He suffers from one of the most terrific ills to which humanity is heir—a cruel, and in his case incurable, form of face neuralgia. A nerve originating in the brain and spreading in three branches over his face is the seat of the disorder. When the first of the three branches is affected, the pain is felt in the forehead, the eyes and the upper eyelids. When the second is implicated, the seats of the pain are the under eyelids, nostrils, upper lip and upper row of teeth. When the third nerve is involved the victim is tortured by exquisite pain in the under lip, lower row of teeth and the chin. When all three branches of this nerve (the trigeminus) are affected, the agony is simply infernal. This disease from which Prince Bismarck is suffering is, in the majority of cases (certainly in his case), the result of severe mental labor, anxiety and worry, and oftener affects the middle aged and the old than the young. "Bismarck allows his beard to grow because he cannot bear a razor near his face. He speaks in a whisper, as if fearing to rouse his tormentor, and often when speaking tears fall from his eyes with every word and roll down his furrowed cheeks into his showy beard." Such is the picture drawn by a distinguished Berlin physician.

"AN ARAB WELCOME!"

Because thou com'st, a ready guest,
Unto my tent, I bid thee rest.
This cruse of oil, this skin of wine,
These tamarinds and dates are thine;
And while thou eatest, Medjid there
Shall bathe the heated nostrils of thy mare.

Alla il'Allah! even so
An Arab chieftain treats his foe,
Holds him as one without a fault
Who breaks his bread and takes his salt;
And in fair battle strikes him dead
With the same pleasure that he gives him bread!

MARJORIE'S BRITISHER.

Upon the night of the 20th of December, '81, the solitary figure of a man was buffeting his way against a blinding snowstorm through the silent, deserted streets of Alexandria—that quaint, dead, old-world town which still slumbers upon the banks of the Potomac, in the pleasant State of Virginia. He staggered along for a mile until he arrived at the gates of a gaunt, grim old house, which stood some way back from the road, known to the country round as Braddock's. His knock at the door was answered by a negro, who, carefully opening it but an inch or two, pushed the muzzle of a huge horse-pistol out and asked who was there. The mention of his name, however, had an immediate influence upon the servant, who threw the door wide open, welcomed him with a broad grin, and led the way across the hall to a long, dark, panelled room, dimly lighted by a candle stuck in silver sconces, and where were seated around a table a score of gaunt, grave-faced men, who greeted him with a sort of quiet enthusiasm which sounded like distant thunder.

He who occupied the chair at the head of the table—a big, fine looking man, who wore his own iron gray hair—rose as Nahum Bond entered, and said: "Better late than ever, Brother Nahum. We waited half an hour for you; but as time is short and business is pressing we considered it best to proceed at once."

The young divine muttered something about being detained in the town, and sat himself upon the right hand of the president.

A stranger might have been pardoned for imagining that the object of this meeting was some sort of religious celebration, so stern and grave were the faces of its members, added to the presence of gentlemen in holy orders, and of a huge brass-bound Bible among the papers and inkstands which were strewed about the table. But its real character was soon made clear by the big man beside the Bible, who rose and said: "Now that our number is completed by the arrival of one of our most earnest supporters and hearty co-operators, I think I may recapitulate what we have decided upon, for his benefit. What we propose to do is this: in five days, the Britishers will be celebrating, with their usual profane riotousness and drunkenness, their Christmas festival; and we propose to take advantage of their being off their guard to drive them out of the place—into the river, into the woods, no matter where, so long as it be away from Alexandria. I am not a man of blood; but upon an occasion like this it behooves us to be ready to make any sacrifice."

The grim, dark faces, which had been gradually lighting up during the course of this impassioned oration, now relaxed altogether as the speaker sat down, and a loud murmur of applause arose and continued until a tall, weather-beaten Potomac pilot rose. "Good words and true, Brother Hood," he said; "and I am sure we all echo them. For myself, I can guarantee a score of riverside lads who will be a match for any twenty Britishers, grenades, pikes, and all, although none of 'em have ever fired a gun in their lives, except at a canvas-back or a jack rabbit. And I suggest that we make Brother Hood's house, as being away from the town, our magazine and our place of meeting. Now about the men we can get. The Britishers are 150. We ought at least to have 300. 'Cause why? We've disciplined and practice against us. As I said just now, I'll write down twenty for my share."

Then one stern man after another rose—all men of wealth and position in the neighborhood—and in a few minutes 300 good men and true were guaranteed for the cause of liberty.

"So far so good, brethren," said Jeremiah Hood. "And we must begin at once; for five days is none too much time in which to make our plans and to insure unanimity of movement among 300 men. Let us each take solemn oath, brother Alexandrians, that we will not rest until every Britisher shall have been expelled from Virginian soil." He raised the Bible to his lips and passed it to his neighbor, and so on round the table.

The religious ordeal was followed by the more convivial ceremony of passing round a huge black jack brimming with brown October, for the night was bitter, and many members of the league had long distances to go. When they took up their broad-brimmed hats, buckled their cloaks fast around them, and went out, leaving the parson and the host alone.

"Fill your pipe, Nahum," said Jeremiah, "and let us speak of our affairs together."

The two men sat puffing their pipes and gazing at the fire in silence for some minutes; then the old farmer said: "I've been so occupied of late with this project that I have had no time to talk of the course of matters between you and my daughter Marjorie. I hope you make as rapid progress in her good graces as she does in her studies?"

The parson writhed uneasily in his chair, and then, after the manner peculiar to his tin , replied: "I would that I could say so, Master Hood. If I advanced as quickly in her opinion as she does in Latin and French, I should be the happiest man in America. I fear she will not need a tutor much longer."

"Well, then," said Hood, "she will be needing a husband. Hey?"

"And I dare give it as my opinion," quoth the minister, looking askance out of his green eyes at the old farmer, "that the need will be satisfied sooner than people think—sooner than it could be wished for."

The farmer took his pipe from his mouth, and, wheeling himself round, looked keenly at the young man. "That is a dark speech, Nahum. What does it mean?" he asked.

Nahum preserved silence.

"You don't mean to say," continued the old man, "that she has a—a lover, that I know not of?"

Nahum was still silent.

"Who is he?" cried the old man, sternly. "Now, I charge you, Nahum, by all our old friendship to tell me."

"Lieut. Harraden of the king's regiment," replied the minister.

The old man started as if struck. "She—my daughter, dare to give ear to the love speeches of a king's officer! to hold converse with one of the instruments of our oppression, the tramplers of our crops, the violators of our hearths, the enemies of our liberty! Rather than she should so far demean herself, I would shoot her!"

"Nay, Master Hood," said Nahum insinuatingly. "Remember, she is but a young and thoughtless girl; and, who ever knew a girl who did not prefer a red coat to a black one, and empty compliments to words of monition? Do not be too hard on her."

"What sort of young fellow is this Harraden? I know the name somehow. The Harradens used to be neighbors of our family in Kent."

"He is just as the rest of the king's officers are," replied Nahum.

"That means to say, I suppose, that he looks upon any wench as fair game; that he drinks his two bottles of wine at a sitting; that he gambles, blasphemes and fights; is a fop, a bully and a roysterer?"

Nahum had shot his arrow; so he put on his cloak, and wishing the old farmer a sorrowful good night, went out.

The old man strode up and down the room in angry cogitation for some moments. Then he called the negro Cicero. "Let Miss Marjorie speak with me," he said.

The servant, alarmed at the fierce expression upon his master's face, left the room with alacrity; and presently the door opened and Marjorie appeared—a fresh-colored, brown-eyed, brown-haired lass, dressed in the sober style prevalent among the daughters of independent families, but with a dash more of coquetry, in the shape of a ribbon or two and skirts above the ankles, than was generally sanctioned among those stern, God-fearing colonists.

"Do you want me, father?" asked Marjorie, not without a tremor in her voice, as she saw the frown upon Jeremiah Hood's brow, and noted that his hands were tightly clenched behind him, as was his habit when disturbed in spirit.

"Yes, I did," replied her father, without moving his head toward her. "I want a few words with you. Shut the door. I hear that you are carrying on a clandestine acquaintance with Lieut. Harraden of the King's regiment." No answer. "That you, the daughter of Jeremiah Hood, as well known as any man in Virginia as a champion for the rights of the great American people, have so demeaned yourself as to receive the addresses of a roystering young fop, who will pretend to love you and then desert you; and above all, who wears the livery of the tyrant." Marjorie winced a little, but said nothing. "He is an enemy," continued her father, "and all who have dealings with the enemy are traitors to their country and to the holy universal cause of liberty."

"Who told you this, father?" asked Marjorie.

"Never mind who told me," replied the farmer. "I have it upon the very best authority, from one whose word I have never yet had occasion to doubt."

"I know—that sneak, Nahum Bond," murmured the girl.

"What's that? what's that?" asked her father, stopping short in his walk.

"I said Nahum Bond was a sneak, and so he is," repeated Marjorie, who inherited the family spirit, although as a rule she was the most demure and peaceful of girls.

"Never—never let me hear you talk of your respected tutor in that way again," said the angry old man. "He is the man I had fixed upon as a fitting husband for you."

"He, my husband, father!" exclaimed Marjorie, terrified. "Are you in earnest?"

"Ay," returned Mr. Hood, sternly. "Did you ever know me otherwise?"

"Well," said Marjorie, "he may be all you think of him, and I hope he is; but if it were only for his being a—a, what I said just now, father, I couldn't love him."

"But he loves you, Marjorie," said the old farmer; "and I can tell you it is something in these days for a girl to say that she is loved by a man of his character and attainments."

"Yes, I know he does," said Marjorie; "he's always paying me clumsy compliments which I hate, and reading love-poetry and calling me his Dulcinea and his Saccharissa, and I don't know what else besides. A creeping, writhing, yellow-faced creature!"

"At any rate," said Mr. Hood, "it is my command that you cease all acquaintance with this Mr. Harraden. Return him all his love-letters, for, of course, you have been writing to each other, and tell him that you cannot keep up a pretense of love with an enemy of your country."

Marjorie courtesied and left the room.

Mr. Nahum Bond, when he came the next morning to give Marjorie her usual lesson, was uncommonly affable; while the attitude of the young lady toward him was distinctly the reverse. The minister could not fail to notice this, so, when the most uncomfortabe two hours were ended, he said: "Miss Hood, how very cold and distant you are to me to-day. May I ask if I have been guilty of anything to offend you?"

"What's the good of standing there and asking me if you have offended me," replied Marjorie, "when you know very well that you have? I wouldn't be a sneak, if I were you, Mr. Bond."

"A what, Miss Hood!" exclaimed the minister. "A sneak? Surely a very improper expression to fall from the lips of a young lady at any time, but especially when addressed to one whose life is wrapped up in her happiness and welfare."

"Then why should you go and tell my father, knowing his sentiments, about my acquaintance with Mr. Harraden?" asked Marjorie.

"Your father put the question plainly to me," replied Nahum, "and what else could I do? He has suspected it for a long time."

"Somebody has made him suspicious, then," said Marjorie, "for it would never occur to him naturally. I am ashamed of you, Mr. Bond, and I thought better of you."

"Then try and think better of me again, Miss Hood," said the young man, "for I do love you dearly, and you know that I would not do anything to hurt your feelings or to make you miserable. Can you not love me?"

"Mr. Bond," said Marjorie, assuming a dignified air as well as she could, while under the strongest provocation to laugh at the absurd attitude of her wooer. "I love Mr. Harraden; and you I do not. I never can love you! Is that not enough?"

A peculiar look came over Nahum's face, such as Marjorie had never seen there before. "You say, Miss Hood, that you do not and you never can love me," he said. "Must I take this answer as final?"

"Quite final," replied Marjorie; and with a formal courtesy she left the room.

"Final, is it?" muttered Mr. Nahum, as he quitted the house. "Very well, then, Miss. Your father and all his crew, and you also, shall pay for this decision."

Lieut. Edward Harraden of his majesty's Fiftieth regiment of foot—a fine young fellow, with far more of the hearty squire about him than of the typical officer of the day, was waiting that afternoon at a very familiar spot, situated just about half-way between the town and the barracks on Mount Pleasant. Of course he was waiting for Marjorie; and as punctuality is as rigid a virtue in love as in war, he had not to wait long before he espied a light, active form, furs and ribbons flying, making the best of its way toward him through the deep snow, and in a few seconds was pressing his own honest face against the dimples and blushes of Marjorie's.

"Oh, Edward!" cried the breathless girl; "such fun before dinner! You know my tutor—Old Candlesticks, as you call him—well, now, what do you think he's been and done?"

"Can't think, my darling," replied the young officer.

"Well, what should you think was the most unlikely thing in the world that he would do?"

"Well," said the young Englishman, after a pause; for, being a ponderous man, he was a ponderous thinker, "I should think the most unlikely thing he could do would be to make love to you."

"Oh, you clever man!" exclaimed Marjorie, "that's just what he has been doing. The impudence! I could have boxed his ears, as he stood there like a great fish. And you should have seen his face when I told him what I thought of him! Because, you know, he's been and sneaked to my father about our acquaintance; and you know that just as a red rag maddens a bull, so does a red uniform madden my poor old father. And you may imagine, Edward, what a talking-to I got last night? If I'd been a thief, I could not have got worse."

"Well, never mind, my pet," said the officer; "he'll get over it. All the good folks about here look upon us as friends. Give a dog a bad name, you know, and the rest of it. We hear plenty of it, and we've heard more than usual lately."

"But, my love, what are we to do?" urged Marjorie plaintively.

"Why, my dear," replied her swain, "although I am an Englishman, I can't help seeing that this horrid war will soon be over. Your people must be free sooner or later; and although I bear the king's commission, I don't see why they shouldn't be and I can't think it right that two peoples of the same blood and language should be cutting each other's throats as we have for the last seven years been doing. And then all evil feelings will disappear, and I will go to your father and tell him that I love you and that I want you for my wife. And if he refuses, why—why, we'll run away, and if he says all right, why then it's all right."

"What a clever old dear you are!" said Marjorie, looking up in the young fellow's handsome face with a proud admiration.

"How I wish, Marjorie," he said, "that your father wasn't such a prejudiced, strait-laced old fellow. We're going to keep Christmas in such style up at the Mount; but it'll be funny without any girls; but if he'd only let you come, all the other people would follow his example, for he's rather a big man, isn't he?"

"No; I'm afraid you won't get much Virginian beauty up there," said Marjorie. "You should hear how the women all talk against your people, just as much for fashion, I believe, as from genuine principle. But I should like to come."

And so they sauntered on, chatting the too fast hours of daylight away, until the lieutenant was reminded that his was the night-guard, and they went back to the Half-way Tree, as they called their trysting-place, and with one fond kiss they parted.

After nightfall, the preparations for the coup de main were carried on quietly but actively in Alexandria, and no one was more active or energetic than the stalwart old farmer of Braddock's.

As might be imagined, Marjorie was much alarmed at the strange state of affairs at home—at the strings of carts and gangs of men laden with arms and mysterious packages which continued to pass in and out of the garden from dusk until after midnight, all in silence, and looking almost spectral in the dim lantern light.

"What does all this mean, Cicero?" she asked of the old negro.

"I dunno, Missy, I's sure; nebber see sich goin's on, nebber! Gemmans been runnin' up an' down stairs, an' in an' out jes like de flies in de molasses pot."

She then asked one of the workers.

"Why, bless your heart, miss," replied the man, "we're agoin' to do away with the Britishers, that's what we're agoin' to do;" and accompanied his answer with winks and head-shakings which spoke volumes.

"Do away with the Britishers!" repeated Marjorie to herself. "That means fighting, and murder—and perhaps Edward, or father," and a terrible cloud of thoughts came over her mind. "Oh, how happy we could all be," she thought, "if people had no such thing as prejudices!"

Meanwhile, her father was returning from the house of one of the confederates, which stood a little beyond the other side of the town on the road to Mount Pleasant, and was not a little surprised to meet Rev. Nahum Bond, who was evidently in a great hurry. Had it not been pitch dark, he would have noticed, too, that the minister was equally surprised and rather confused at seeing him; but the young man was quick at recovery, and said: 'Just whom I wanted to see, Master Hood. I am sorry to say anything that may offend you, but I feel it my duty to warn you against your daughter."

"Lord! man," exclaimed the old farmer, "what has the wench been doing now? Laughing at her tutor?"

"Nay, nay, Master Hood," replied Nahum; "it is no light matter. I speak not of what she has done, but what she may do. She knows perfectly well what our project is; she loves one of the men against whom we are to work; she met him this afternoon. Put two and two together. Good night." And he was lost in the darkness.

For a moment the old man stood bewildered. Then he smote his brow and muttered: "What a fool I have been not to send her away! Of course, I see what the parson means—that she will betray us—and yet I dare not think that she would do so. Her love for the red-coat may be strong; but it would be strange if her love for her father and her country were not stronger. However, I will see her." And he strode on homeward.

Marjorie met him at the door with a frightened face. "Oh, father, I am so glad you have come," she cried, throwing her arms around his neck; "I am so frightened. Tell me what all this means—these guns and swords and bullets, and all this quiet and secrecy."

Her father gently removed her arms from his neck, and held her out at arm's-length, looking keenly into her deep brown eyes, in each of which a tear glistened. "And you mean to say, Marjorie, that you know nothing about it?"

"Nothing, father, but what Abram Stoke told me just now about doing away with the Britishers," answered Marjorie.

"And did you not tell Mr. Harraden about it, when you met him this afternoon?"

"I did not know it, father—indeed, I did not; and if I had, I do not think that—that—"

"No, no, no!" exclaimed her father, kissing her; "I don't believe you would."

Marjorie went sadly enough up to her room, and in truth hers was not an enviable position. A dread was on her that something terrible was about to happen, something in which the two men she loved above all others in the world were concerned, and she could do nothing to prevent it. At one time she determined that she would warn her lover of the danger; but the image of her stern, patriotic father, and of his wrath at what he would assuredly term a betrayal, came before her. Then she resolved to throw herself at her father's feet and to implore him to abandon his design. Her thoughts were interrupted by a knock at the door; and in answer to her "Come in," the woolly head and ebony countenance of Cicero appeared: "Please Missy, Massa want you. He's in a debil of a rage."

Marjorie went down, and found her father striding up and down the little room he styled his study.

"Marjorie," he said, in a voice which was scarcely coherent for passion, "if I was to shoot you on the spot, it would not be more than you deserve."

"What—what do you mean, father?" asked the terrified girl.

"What do I mean, girl? You know very well what I mean. Read that!" and he threw on the table toward her a small scrap of paper.

She read: "You are betrayed. Be warned in time."

She could not recognize the writing, nor was there any signature to this laconic epistle. Turning it over, she saw in smaller letters: "The penalty for concealing arms or for harboring revolt is immediate death and confiscation of estates."

"But, father," said Marjorie, "I have had nothing to do with this. Surely you do not think that I have betrayed you?"

"Not a word more," said her father, raising his hand; "I know that you have betrayed us. You will keep your room until I find means to send you to Connecticut."

"But, dear father, hear me, I beg of you. Hear your daughter, your Marjorie, whom you say you love," cried the girl in piteous tones.

"Silence!" said Hood, in a stern voice. "Did I not love you as I do you would ere now have been lying where you now stand. Obey me and go."

Poor Marjorie left the room, crying bitterly; and her father went out to tell the news to the confederates.

Next evening Alexandria lay sound asleep in her mantle of snow as the clock struck midnight. It was the 24th of December, 1781. A few lights from the ships by the quay-side, and from the Royal George and city hotels, were the only indications of a town visible from the British huts upon Mount Pleasant. In these "good old days" folk kept reasonable hours, and except upon such special occasions as a birthday night or a subscription ball, as a rule retired to rest about the same hour that their modern posterity are at dinner. But upon Mount Pleasant there was activity, and moving about of lanterns, and buckling on of knapsacks, and buttoning up of gaiters, and ere the twelfth solemn note had died away, a hundred men, were drawn up in motionless array upon the little parade-ground. At a few minutes past the hour, the word was given; the company faced to the right and commenced to tramp through the thick snow toward the sleeping, unconscious town beneath them. At their head marched the colonel, and by his side a tall figure muffled in a long cloak. They did not march by the direct route to Alexandria; but in order to avoid passing through the town, chose a back path, which in the course of half an hour brought them at the gate of Braddock's. Here the guide—he of the cloak—would have left them; but the colonel held him fast by the collar. "Nay, my good fellow," he said, "not so fast. Perhaps you are playing us false. Lieut. Harraden, take a sergeant and two files and enter the house."

The lieutenant saluted, and with his men went up to the door, while the remainder of the company "stood easy" in the garden, bayonets fixed and muskets ready. In obedience to his knock, Cicero opened the door in his usual cautious manner; but a kick from the foot of the sergeant hurried his movements, for it sent the door flying open, and poor Cicero all but sprawling on the polished oak floor. The lieutenant—whose feelings may be imagined at making such an entry into the shrine of his goddess—walked in and requested the rueful Cicero to show him into his master's room.

"Massa hab go to bed dis tree hours," said the scared negro.

"Very sorry," said Harraden, "but I must see him."

As a rule, it was as much as Cicero's place was worth to disturb his master during even his afternoon nap; but the vision of the red-coats in the garden urged him to sink all reluctance in the matter; and in a few minutes a heavy step was heard descending the staircase, and Mr. Hood appeared, clad in nightshirt, greatcoat and slippers.

"Very sorry to disturb you at this time of night, Mr. Hood," said the lieutenant, politely; "but I am acting under orders, and I must ask you to show me the way to your cellars."

"Who are you, sir?" asked the old man scornfully.

"I am Lieut. Harraden, of his Britannic majesty's Fiftieth regiment of foot."

"H'm! Harraden. Fiftieth regiment. Kent name and Kent regiment. I'm ashamed of you, sir; but as I see you have force at your back I suppose I must obey."

He led the way down to the cellars. The men searched high and low, sounded floor and walls with the butt ends of their muskets; but not an arm of any kind could they find.

The lieutenant reported matters to the colonel. That officer, who was smoking a pipe in Jeremiah Hood's study, fumed and raged. "Call in that rascally spy," he said.

The sergeant went out and returned with Nahum Bond, almost dropping with shame and terror. The old farmer's feelings may be imagined when he beheld his ideal man, the destined husband for Marjorie, before him; but he could find no vent for his disgust in words; he simply sat down and groaned.

"Didn't you say that there were arms and ammunition stored here, and that an attack upon our position was to be made to-morrow night?" roared the colonel; and without waiting for whatever answer the trembling traitor could have given, continued: "Of course you did. Sergeant, do your duty."

Nahum was dragged out, and before the old farmer could interfere, the stillness of the outside world was broken by the discharge of half a dozen muskets. There was one cry, and Nahum Bond had paid the penalty of his double perfidy with his life.

"You will remain here, Lieutenant Harraden," said the colonel, "until we receive marching orders."

He went out. The rattle of fixing bayonets was heard, and in a few minutes the garden was empty, save for one stiff, rigid figure, with eyes wide staring up into the starlit heavens.

The old man seemed to have fallen into a stupor, but the departure of the troops awakened him. He rose and approached Harraden. "You are the gentleman I believe, sir," he said, "with whom my daughter is acquainted."

"I have that inexpressible honor," said the young officer. "And in return for the service I have rendered you to-night, I have to beg that you will bestow on me her hand."

"Service, sir! What service?" exclaimed the astonished old man.

"Did you not get a note, warning you that you were betrayed?" said the lieutenant.

"I did, sir. And what then?" replied the old gentleman.

"I wrote that, sir," said Harraden. "And I wrote it at the expense of my honor as a British officer, out of my great love for your daughter. It has given you time to get your cellar cleared of the arms stored there. We shall leave Alexandria in a few days, so that there will be no need for you to meditate a continuance of your design. Had I not warned you the consequences—well, you know what the consequences would have been. Moreover, Mr. Hood, remember that I exposed that double-dealing traitor who lies outside in the snow. I'm obliged to blow my own trumpet a bit, because I know how strong your prejudices are against my country. Yet, after all, Mr. Hood, there is something even thicker than the mere fact of being Englishmen between us. You surely can't forget that the Hood and Harraden estates have lain alongside each other in old Kent for centuries."

The simple heartiness of this appeal touched the old man's heart. "I'm an old fool," he said, rising "to be meddling in these sort of affairs at my time of life. I am quite sensible of the services you have rendered me; and if you ask as a reward that ——"

At this moment the door was pushed timidly open, and Marjorie's terrified face appeared. She had heard the sound of angry voices and the report of firearms, and had been quaking in fear upon the landing above; but when she saw her father and her sweetheart with their hands joined in the middle of the room, she uttered a joyful cry and sprang toward them. "Oh, I have been so afraid!" she said; "I heard such angry talking and the sound of shooting, and I was sure that one of you had shot the other."

"Nay, lass," said her father, "Mr. Harraden has saved us all from ruin and disgrace, and that double-faced villain Nahum Bond has been shown in his true colors. He was, I find, what you called him—a sneak, and something worse. Now, then," he said, nodding his head toward the British officer, "sweetheart together as much as you like."

Mount Pleasant was evacuated by the British in the course of the week; and everybody knows that a treaty of peace was signed in less than a year after these events between Great Britain and the United States of America. Edward Harraden retired from the army, returned to Alexandria, married Marjorie, and was soon one of the most popular men in Virginia.

THE RING'S MOTTO.

A lover gave the wedding ring
Into the goldsmith's hand.
"Grave me," he said, "a tender thou Within the golden band."
The goldsmith graved,
With careful art—
"Till death us part."

The wedding bell rang gladly out
The husband said, "O, wife,
Together we shall share the grie
The happiness of life.
I give to thee
My hand, my heart,
Till death us part."

'Twas she that lifted now his hand,
(O, love that this should be!)
Then on it placed the golden band,
And whispered tenderly:
"Till death us join,
Lo, thou art mine
And I am thine.

"And when death joins we never more
Shall know an aching heart,
The bridal of that better love
Death has no power to part,
That troth will be
For thee and me
Eternity."

So up the hill and down the hill
Through fifty changing years,
They shared each other's happiness.
They dried each other's tears,
Alas, Alas,
That death's cold dart
Such love can part.

But one sad day—she stood alone
Beside his narrow bed;
She drew the ring from off her hand,
And to the goldsmith said:
"Oh, man, who graved
With careful art,
'Till death us part,'

Now grave four other words for me—
'Till death us join.'" He took
The precious golden band once more,
With solemn, wistful look,
And wrought with care
For love, not coin,
"Till death us join."

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Burmese Women at Bath.

At one of its moorings on the river Bankok a tourist on an American steamer saw how Burmese women bathe. The women stood by the water's edge for a short time, he says, and presently were joined by a number of men and boys, who came tumbling down the sand bank with roars of merry laughter that might have been heard on the other side of the river. They all waded in together for a short distance, and began to undress; but mark you how they did it. Let us take one young woman as an example. She wades until the water is just above her knees. In a second she sits down, and lo and behold, in that brief second she has stripped herself by one of the most dexterous twitches it is possible to conceive! She holds her dress aloft with both hands, folds it into a neat, circular little bundle, and then plants it firmly on her head. I ought to say that when she was standing on the bank she unwound her jetty tresses, which now fell over her tawny back like a covering. In a crouching way she goes deeper into the stream, and when the water is above her waist she strikes out and swims. She is evidently as familiar with the water as a mermaid. Bless you, how she gambols! And all the time how she keeps that bundle on her head is a mystery to me. She swims around the steamer, she laughs up at us, she glides quietly up behind some Burmese youth and splashes him with water, and then she darts off to avoid the return shower. When she tires she returns to shallow water, sits down again, removes the bundle from her head and begins to dress. I shudder. I think now there must be an exposure. But nothing of the kind. She drapes herself in such a way that when she rises like a flash, her raiment has fallen all about her. From first to last nothing had occurred to make even the white-faced nun blush who is watching her. The men dressed and undressed in a similar way. When they had all bathed, each man, woman and child relighted a cheroot, scrambled up the bank and slowly disappeared toward their village among the palms.

A Queen's Etiquette.

A London letter says: Court etiquette has grown more rigid and inflexible during these months of increasing morbidness, and soon it is feared the queen will be as far removed from her people as a Chinese emperor. She carries out her wilful insistence upon etiquette in every least detail, and even when it concerns only her own children and grandchildren. When the Princess Louise returned from Canada and arrived at Windsor, she was kept waiting until she had changed her attire and until the queen sent word she was prepared to receive her. It is reported that the princess entered the drawing room in the evening to await dinner, dressed in a most lovely crimson velvet gown, with crimson silk hose to match. The queen happening to espy the princess' feet, said: "Do yo not know that colored stockings are not permitted in my presence? Go to your room at once and change your stockings." And so the poor princess came down to dinner in a crimson velvet dress wearing white stockings! Not one of the royal children ever visits the queen, except by special and formal invitation. Her majesty appoints the hour for her own children to come and for them to go. One can imagine the unnaturalness of such a household. The prince consort was stately, but he was a genial, happy, mirth-loving gentleman. He was a most affectionate husband and father, and no royal etiquette ever stood in the way of his fine German heartiness. Since his death his children have had no parental companionship, and they are as far removed from the queen as though they had not been born of her. It is well known that the prince of Wales has very great influence with his mother, and is personally deeply attached to her. He was a constant companion of his father, and he quite remembers how his father managed the queen in the old days. The prince is said to be most charming in his relations to his mother, and is always upon his most beautiful manners in her presence. He at times does approach her with great affection and even tenderness of feeling and demonstration.

Knives and Knives.

The time was and not so very long ago either, when every knife in use was imported, and the manufacturers of Sheffield and of Leeds had it all their own way. To-day a marked change is taking place. Steel as finely tempered as any wrought in the far-famed cottages of Sheffield is the product of the American market, and the demand for the solid ivory handles of English make has largely yielded to the many inventions of American genius. Celluloid has been brought to great perfection for knife handles. The main article in its composition is tissue paper. Camphor is largely used in its preparation, and it owes its hardness to the admixture of the pigment of white zinc lead. It is practically indestructible and has the immense advantage over ivory of never becoming discolored or cracking under the merciless reign of the relentless Biddy, who would appear to have been born with a settled conviction that the hotter water is, the better for the knives. Rubber handles, too, play a most important part in this country. They were first introduced under an old German patent, which has long lapsed, but which was worth over $40,000 a year. But after all "knives is knives," no matter what handles they have, and the hungry diner is most interested in the temper of the steel of which they are made than in the appearance of the handle. The woes of the carver have been often dwelt upon, but they are only less in degree than those of the guest who is forced to tear his tenderloin asunder or employ muscular effort to separate the small joint of his chicken, because fate or fashion has given him a blunt knife. This is one, and by no means a small objection to the plated knife, which has otherwise very much to recommend it, in that it looks nice and is much more easily kept clean than that of steel. There is an immense demand for these plated knives, so much so that cutlery imported from England is plated for the American buyer. Every lady likes to have a well-appointed table, and it is an immense gain to have so important an article as the knife look its best on all occasions. This the plated knife does to admiration, and the possessor thereof has no agonies to endure from badly cleaned, stained, spotted steel, or the presence of brick dust in the crevices of the handle. The possessors of good silverware, on the other hand, do not perhaps appreciate the introduction of the plated knife, and as silver ones are only de rigueur for fish and fruit, they retain their preference for the finely tempered steel of the best cutlery, and look complacently upon the table brightened by its presence.

Summer Rest.

The coolest and most restful summer is not always had by running away from home. We have in mind a summer room, fitted up by an ambitious little woman, for her retreat. She could not go to the watering place, or even go to some uncomfortable country boarding house, and so be like her neighbors. Her children were very dear to her, but all through the long winter she had nursed, mended and taught them. Seldom was she happier that when attending to their little wants. Occasionally, when she bent her head over the long rows of button holes, she thought of her girlhood ambitions and she rebelled over a summer spent in these same rooms, preparing the children for fall. She could not say to the tired, overworked husband that he should spare money that she might go away, and yet she felt the pressure too great. It was then a friend suggested a "summer room." It was to be a retreat, where no one unbidden might enter. A lumber room was taken for the purpose, with a window looking south. For, in order to make the delusion of rest and change perfect, it was necessary to catch all the air possible and make the room as cool as was practicable. It was a dreary, uninhabitable looking place; the wall was dull and smoky, the floor uneven and dingy. A casual observer would have said, "It will cost you as much to fit that room as to take your trip." We shall see. First, the old familiar process of planing and puttying made the floor ready for the stain which should convert the surface into a rich red groundwork. A fancy matting square, neatly bound, was placed in the center of the room and nailed to the floor with brass-headed nails. Chairs too unsightly for use were covered by the lady's skillful fingers, and divans were made of soap boxes carefully cushioned. A three-sided catchall mounted on canes formed a receptacle for fancy work, while a screen made of a clothes-horse frame neatly covered divided the room into cozy compartments. At the window was hung a blind that cost 8 cents, over which fell cheese cloth curtains neatly bound in pink. A table scarf showed the colors of the chinx used in upholstering, and there were scattered around such ornaments as could be taken from the rest of the house without great loss. A set of stained pine shelves, ebonized and well rubbed down, held the books. After the pretty place was completed, the little mother found her retreat lonely without the cherubs, so good behavior became associated with mamma's room. A large Japanese umbrella was placed outside the door for baby, and after a while a striped awning shaded the south window.

The "Rosebuddy" Boston Girls.

You ask me how I like the Boston girls, says a writer in the Boston Home Journal. I just like them, and that's a fact; they are better than their reputation—and they aren't. They know more—of flirtation, less of books and affectation—than they are credited with, and are much better looking; in fact, if a Boston girl is a beauty she holds a flush hand, and I never found a town where girls, as a collective noun, were more fond of the stronger sex who has a reputation for diablerie—diablerie usually lent them, rather than their personal property, by the footlights. It is highly proper, however, that such things should be in the greatest show town in America. Apropos of this is a little anecdote of Harry Dixey, who has done more to make Pounce & Co. run than any one else in the company, in spite of the fact that he is the only one of whom the author speaks in terms of direct dissatisfaction, for Dixey is popular with the girls; when he walks down the street, they turn and walk after him in a manner that assures one that Gilbert was not exaggerating, "not at all, not at all, not at all," when he created Bunthorne and Grosvenor. A few days since the much admired young man, who has danced himself into fame upon as trim a pair of nether limbs (of which he is justly proud) as nature doesn't give many of us—ankles straight, knees turned out, you know—was walking along one of the thoroughfares, with a trail behind of girls that seemed, like a rolling snow-ball, to gather forces every moment, until, in despair, he rushed into an adjacent music store, and in a very unpatiance tone exclaimed, "For God's sake, hide me, somewhere, from all these women!" Nor is this the only incident of the kind, as the habitues of Tremont street, between the Tremont house and the Museum, assure me, where groups of school girls can be seen before and after every matinee, watching for a glimpse of Jack Mason. When George Sweet was taking his princely fling—and enjoying it right royally, too, at the Boston, a fortnight since, it was the regular thing—a bit of the business of the engagement—to see some of the most rosebuddy of "the rosebud garden of girls," hanging about to see Don Gaestan sans stage toggery, and I once saw three little buds, walking boldly up to the stage entrance, under a small battery of masculine eyes, to enjoy the emotion of sending flowers to an actor. The worst phase of the matter to me is that these same admirers catch greedily at any of the silly gossip about these adored actors, the more to their discredit, the more greedily swallowed whole, and retailed with relish. Why, acts of heroism in the chivalrous days never threw such a glamour over young girl's fancies as stories of dissipation and intrigue lend an actor in their eyes. There is something wrong in this generation of girls.

Women and the Type-Writer.

The nature of the work required in type-writing and phonography, and the wide and rapidly increasing demand for it, invest the subject with a special attraction for women who desire to earn a living. The business known as type-writing is only about eight years old, having been first brought into general notice at the time of the Centennial exhibition. A young woman sitting in front of the instrument disposes herself as easily as when in front of the piano-forte. She plays on the notes, but neither uses her feet nor bends her back. The type-writing machine occupies less room than the sewing-machine, and to operate it is very much less trying to nerves, spine and soul. "I have noticed with surprise," said a well-known business man recently, "that our girls, after seven or eight hours' work, perform their last half-hour's duty without apparent fatigue." The cost of the two instruments is about the same, the price of a first-class type-writer being from $80 to $100, but in two months' you can earn enough to pay for your type-writer by working on it only six or eight hours a day. There are other things to be said in favor of the type-writer. It operates as legibly as a printing press—more legibly than some printing presses. If "carbon" or "manifold" paper is used, three pages were written simultaneously; at the end of your allotted task you have three copies instead of one. If, therefore, the operator on a type-writing machine can copy a page of MS. at the rate of sixty words a minute, or three times as fast as a skilled penman can do it, she can take three copies of that page simultaneously, or, in other words, can accomplish the work of nine skilled penmen. In all business offices, therefore, where much copying is required, the type-writer is a valuable assistant. It has been found by business men who have availed themselves of woman's work in type-writing that women possess the inestimable advantage of not being the rivals of their employers. A man acting the part of private secretary or confidential clerk may leave his employer at any moment and set up for himself. With young women the case is different. In the next place, "My private secretary," said a well-known solicitor of patents the other day, nodding in the direction of a young woman who sat in front of a type-writer, "has been in the office two years and has never lost a day, nor an hour." The average salary of such a secretary is $500 a year. Sometimes $1,000 is earned. The use of the type-writer can be learned in a week, and after a practice of three of four weeks a clever girl can write faster than a penman. Persons who can play on a pianoforte become proficient in a shorter time. The best secretary is one who can write short hand and can operate a type-writer. She is able to take down answers to letters, and then to make copies on the type-writer from her phonographic notes. The business of a firm of solicitors for patents has so increased since the advent of the type writer (their days seem to have become longer, because so much work can be done in a day) that they are training in their office two or three young women to become operators on it, who meanwhile make themselves generally useful, and receive for their services $5 or $10 a month. After a year so spent these pupils will earn $40 a month.

Bread and Bread-Making.

It was Sarah Bernhardt who said that, "with all their good wheat, the Americans make bad bread." To the careful observer, it would appear that there is something of justice in her remark. In many of the old countries of Europe, notably in France and Germany, the staff of life is generally of an excellent quality, although much of it undoubtedly made not only from American-grown wheat, but from American-made flour. It seems, therefore, that the fault must be with the bakers of this country. The first process in bread-making is the inducing of the necessary fermentation, on the success of which depends the lightness of the loaf. There appears to be no uniformity of methods practiced. Bakers' yeast, with a proportion of malt, or malt and hops added, and a sort of dried yeast prepared by the brewers, are much used. In some parts of Continental Europe it is still the custom to leaven bread with a piece of dough kept from a previous baking day. As the sort of yeast used differs, so also does the period allowed for fermentation. This is a nice thing to determine, and requires special skill. It varies from two and a half to twelve hours, the variation depending on the activity of the yeast, the temperature and the changes of the weather. The fermentation being complete, the addition of the required flour to make the dough of the proper consistency is the next step. This is a matter which necessitates care and experience, as does also the kneading. The latter process is now done in some countries by the aid of machinery, a plan which augurs well for the cleanliness of the bread. Baking is another important measure. To secure the delicately-browned crisp crust is worth some painstaking. Without a perfect crust, which at once delights both the eye and the palate, all care in previous processes will go for naught. The shape of the loaf may seem to be an immaterial matter, but we can not help thinking that the long, slender loaf of the French and Germans, with its cafe-au-lait outside, is sweeter and withal more wholesome than if the same dough were baked in a mass, broad and deep. The bake-house should be free from all foul odors, which are readily absorbed by the fermenting bread. It is safe to say that much of the bread made is spoiled by fermentation in air laden with noisome odors.

Lovers' Hat Bands.

The fellow who paves his way with chocolate, creams, caramels and tolu taffey, with now and then an invitation to the theater and a bunch of bleeding hearts, will soon receive a little note, cut on the bias, saying: "I have something real nice for you, and if not engaged I would like you call this evening." The something nice consists of a hat band. She buys a quarter of a yard of blue satin ribbon and a skein of old gold floss, and has his initials, or full name if it is as brief as Jim Crow, stamped on the ribbon, and if she is a novice in the South Kensington stitch, embroiders them in about four days and the thing is done. If he likes she will sew it in place, and instantly his felt becomes a love of a hat. After all, this hat-band epidemic is not a bad idea, for if a lady has any doubts about the freedom of a gentleman's heart she has only to get a peep into the crown of his hat and the question is solved. It may be pertinent just here to remark, for the benefit of the ladies, that the hat-band has been ignored for another little gew-gaw which answers the same purpose. They now select a piece of silk to suit the taste, provided it is not of the passionate red stamp, and cut it an oval, so as to cover nearly the whole crown of the hat. They then pink the edge or finish it off with feather-stitching and elaborate the center with the monogram of the gentleman after their own heart. This is pasted in the hat, and the effect is not only pretty, if it harmonizes with the lining, but the owner thereof has the credit of keeping space with the novelties.

Hair Cure.

A lively old lady, who died far advanced in her eighties, and was proud in extreme old age of her beautiful dark hair, was accustomed, when a girl, to hang up her night cap every morning filled with salt. This was shaken up into a japanned dressing box every night on retiring, but enough salt remained clinging to the cambric to secure, as she thought, the remarkable preservation of her hair. Dr. Holmes has sung or gossiped about the "widening part," which is one of the telling tracks of passing years; but until lately the prevailing fashions of dressing the hair did not make any parting to show. Those who wear the hair in true classic style, with the pure white line from brow to crown, may find some use in the following recommendation of the New York Evening Post for strengthening the hair and renewing thin spots: "To a quart of warm water allow one tablespoonful of salt, and just before retiring for the night wet the head thoroughly with this, not along the widening seam alone, but the entire head. Repeat this operation for one or two nights each week until good effects are apparent." It is likely that the vigorous rubbing which this treatment makes necessary afterward is of as much use to the hair as the saline treatment.

A Full-Formed Fancy.

For a handsome, full-formed lady a most elegant costume of rich black silk is made and trimmed in such a manner that it imparts an appearance of slenderness. The lower edge of the skirt is finished with two rows of side plaiting; above, in front of skirt, is a deep plastron, apron-shape, of silk edged with Spanish lace, as are also the side pieces, which extend from waist-line down as long as the front apron. The spaces between the plastrons are Vandyke shape, and are filled in with ruffles of Spanish lace; if preferred, plaitings of silk may be used instead of lace. The back drapery is long and gracefully arranged under cluster loops of Ottoman ribbon, about an inch and a half wide. Plain, long, jersey-fitting basque and sleeves, trimmed on front of bodice with Spanish lace, put on in form of an inverted Vandyke, the wide portion being at the throat, while the point comes to a taper at the waist-line, beneath a loop bow of Ottoman ribbon. Smaller Vandykes of narrow lace are on the sleeves, and plaited frills of white lace in the neck and at wrists complete this very stylish dress, which can be appropriately worn upon all occasions where a handsome toilet is required.

Something New in Hair.

One of the new styles in hair-dressing is to arrange the tresses very high upon the head in a Chinese knot on one side, and in wavy loops held by a jewel-headed pin on the other, with soft ripples and a few light irregular curls falling over the forehead. The much-maligned fringe, to which so many American women have remained faithful, has long been abandoned by Parisiennes. Every style of coiffure here at present, whether dressed high upon the head or low in the nape of the neck, is graceful and becoming. Diamonds and other gems studded about in the hair are in high vogue. Most ladies choose a star, crescent, or a floral device, the color of the leaf and blossom being represented by jewels of a hue matching each. Others go further and wear jeweled frogs, crabs, and the like. Account was lately given of a very wealthy lady in fashionable circles abroad, appearing in a costume upon which showed, either upon dress or head, a jeweled spider, butterfly, scorpion, bee and tortoise.

Pretty Aprons.

Fancy aprons are now in vogue for morning and even home evening wear. They are made of cambric, plain and figured muslin, and even of mull or in silk, and are trimmed with embroideries, laces and ribbons. One style is made with fine plaits of cambric meeting in the center, bordered at the side with handsome open-work embroidery. The bib is of the embroidery, and is pointed below the waist, where it meets the perpendicular plaits. A more elaborate apron is made, alternating stripes of muslin with lace insertion, full lace frills all around, a pocket surrounded by lace and clusters of loops of satin ribbon. A dressy appearance is given by ornamenting the front of the apron below the bib with several frills of lace. Charming little aprons are made of silk or satin and trimmed with Spanish or French lace in white or black—sometimes both, and loops of ribbon or sprays of flowers.

Mrs. Langtry's Bath.

Twenty thousand persons visited Long Branch on the Fourth. The great attraction was Mrs. Langtry bathing. Accompanied by Freddie Gebhardt she arrived from Coney Island. Four hundred persons witnessed her feats in the water. She swam with a chest stroke, taking a long stroke. The crowd applauded her, to which the lady smilingly responded by swimming under the water and doing various oddities. Freddie stood looking on from the bluff. He was dressed in a duck suit, white muslin cravat and straw hat. He seemed to enjoy the applause immensely, and was by no means sparing of it himself. The full perfection of her figure was seen at its best in the role she assumed as one of the goddesses of the sea. Her motions were easy, and altogether she was, perhaps, three-quarters of an hour in the water. Upon resuming her walking attire, she wore a tight-fitting steel-colored silk costume, strong, thick boots and a light parasol. The pair went for a drive along the avenue, and returned to New York by the 6:15 p. m. train.

Plumage.

Traveling dresses are being made out of a coarse woolen material very like that used for horse rugs. They are useful, and in some cases are even suitable and becoming. The make is necessarily simple, consisting of plain skirt without flounce or kilt, and the tunic gathered into a few natural folds, but without trimmings of any kind. Bands of velvet around the skirt form the only ornamentation allowed upon this severely plain mode of costume. Plaids and woolens generally promise to be as much in requisition for seaside wear this year as the lighter materials of cambric, muslin, China silk, cashmere and surah.

Among new teagowns are several of open-work cream batiste embroidery over pale-colored surah. The skirt and jacket are separate, and entirely of embroidery over the color, except in front, where the silk forms kilting down the center of the skirt, and a loose shirt down the front of the jacket. Cream lace cascades peep out daintily from basque, cuffs and collar. Finely kilted cream nuns' veiling, and the new kind, stamped with the old day chintz patterns, revived, are fashionable; also muslin, profusely trimmed with Valenciennes lace.

Parisian women are reported to have quite given up the little knot of hair twisted in the nape of the neck, which, to say the truth, never was in great favor with the Parisians. Now all the hair is taken up from the roots and twisted into a thick torsade, which is arranged at the top of the head into an 8. In front the hair is waved in bandeaux or frizzled into a fringe. The back hair is fastened with a tortoise-shell or jet comb. Ornamental pins of tortoise shell, jet, gold or silver are also very fashionable.

A lovely young bride in New York recently wore at the belt of her wedding dress of cream satin a dainty half-basket made of pearls and lace over a foundation of gold wire. The basket was filled with orange blossoms, white lilacs, and primroses, with tiny garlands of delicate vines and small white blossoms falling over her dress from the edges of the basket.

The chapeau panier is gaining ground. Many were to be seen at the Grand Prix. One, the basketwork of which was of gold, was strikingly effective amid a multitude of elegant specimens of millinery. It was trimmed with dark green velvet, and with a bunch of wild flowers, consisting of purple clover and sun daisies.

The short sleeve is assuming dimensions which more justly entitle it to the name of a sleeve. In many cases it is no longer only a strap or a bunch of flowers, but something more. The short puffed sleeve has been seen upon several evening dresses of late; clusters and sprays of flowers rest upon the corsage as much as ever.

The Japanese fete has given an impetus in the direction of Japanese costume, which shows itself in other things beside morning dresses and dressing gowns. This was especially noticeable at the Grand Prix, where, among other novelties of fashion, were flat sunshades, after the pattern of those used by ladies of Japan.

Langtry turbans are in great demand, as they are becoming to faces either round or slender, and can be worn upon any occasion, the plain or elaborate style of their garniture settling the question of their appropriateness for church, matinee, street, or traveling use.

Ruching is again worn inside the neck band of dresses, and is now edged with the finest of lace, either flat Valenciennes, Oriental or Pompadour. The ruche often trims the edge of front of waist a finger's length.

The requisite dash of yellow in a white toilet is sometimes given by wearing an amber necklace and amber bracelets, or with yellow topaz jewelry.

Nuns' gray riding habits, relieved by the merest dash of crimson, appear to be a favorite riding habit in Central park this season.

As the season is approaching for pleasure-seekers to be on the wing, costume for the country and the seaside are in preparation.

The high novelty in walking suits in Paris is a combination of fine black cashmere and white moire on white Ottoman silk.

Sun umbrellas are to match the color of the dress, and are mounted on thick oaken sticks, with handles studded with gold.

Scotch plaid glace silk of very dark colors are used in combination with surah and cashmere for semi-dress costumes.

Pansies of all colors and sizes on grounds of various colors appear in chene effects on some sash ribbons and scarfs.

Violet, lilac, pansy, heliotrope, dahlia and many other red tints of purple are fashionable for silk and wool costumes.

Red in moderate quantities gives a fine dash of bright color to black, gray, pale blue and ecru dresses.

The plaids and checks of new ginghams come in admirable mixtures of all the new colors and shades.

Both high and low chignons are worn by fashionable women, but they must be small.

English turbans and Fanchons divide the popular favor of young ladies at the moment.

White Danish kid gloves, decorated with lilies of the valley, are worn by bridesmaids.

Long shell or metal hairpins take precedence of all other ornaments for the coiffure.

Tiny pine cones are seen upon new French bonnets.

Morsels.

If pieces of beefsteak are left over from breakfast or dinner, do not throw them away. Keep them in the refrigerator until you have enough for a meal. Then cut them in neat little pieces, put them in a saucepan or small kettle; pour water over them and let them stew gently for two hours. Cut an onion in slices and add it with plenty of pepper and salt. Half a lemon is a pleasing addition. When the time is up, skim each "onion atom" out, and the lemon also. Thicken the gravy with flour. Add, if you choose, a teaspoonful of Worcestershire sauce, and your effort to economize will be crowned with success.

A delicious chocolate pudding is made of one quart of milk, three ounces of chocolate, six eggs, one cup of sugar, and two teaspoonfuls of vanilla. Boil the milk, and stir in the grated chocolate. When this is dissolved, take from the fire and stir in the beaten yolks of six eggs; then add the sugar and vanilla. Bake in a pudding dish for half an hour, and make a meringue of the whites of the eggs, with three teaspoonfuls of sugar beaten with them.

Jumbles which will keep a month are made thus: One pound of butter, one pound of sugar, two pounds of flour, three eggs, nine teaspoonfuls of water, three of baking powder, with salt and flavoring to suit the taste. Roll them, and bake in a quick oven.

A pretty way to vary orange jelly is, after making the jelly in the usual way, to fill the mold half full with the jelly and lay slices of orange in and cover with the rest of the jelly. Pineapple jelly is also very nice with grated pineapple put in in this way.

For breakfast try this: Take the skin off a nice piece of salt codfish; wash it in several waters, and lay it on a gridiron to broil. It should be broiled for about twenty minutes, and must be turned often to prevent burning. This is nice for tea also.

Bananas sliced and served with ice cream are very delicate and dainty. They should be sliced and have a little powdered sugar scattered over them for about an hour before serving. Set them in the refrigerator for that length of time.

A dish which may tempt a failing appetite or be relished by a convalescent is this: Take two or three sardines from a box, drain all the oil from them, and broil them; then lay them on slices of buttered toast.

If after taking the house-plants from the shelves the window looks strangely, get some of the cheap but pretty vestibule lace, and tack above the top shelf. It will relieve the otherwise barren look.

Spiced plums are delicious. To eight pounds of plums allow four of sugar, one teaspoonful each of cinnamon and cloves, one small cup of vinegar. Cook until they are thick as jelly.

If you wish to have the best results in cake-making, always use pulverized sugar.

DISCORD.

Swift through the fragrant air it fell,
A single word;
The wound it made no word may tell—
For no one heard
Save one sweet heart, whose very life
Is love and truth.
This heart the word pierced like a knife;
No pulse of ruth
Thrilled him who aimed the cruel word;
He willed and spoke;
A fair face quivered, soft lips stirred,
A fond heart broke.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

Secretary Teller has issued an order that no proposal be received for consideration by the department of the interior from any person, firm or corporation in default in the performance of any contract or agreement made with the department, or who has failed to perform the same to the satisfaction of the department; nor will any contract hereafter be awarded to such person, firm or corporation. The order went into effect on the 11th inst. In a decision Secretary Teller holds that a filing made before a clerk in the office of a register of the land office who may be acting de facto, but not de jure, has the same effect as if before the register, and is valid.

2 There is just one vacant clerkship in Washington to be filled by the civil service commission, and that is the result of an accident. The appointments clerks were busy until late Saturday evening getting the records straightened out with every blank filled up. Examinations were in full blast at the treasury, and finally all were disposed of except one $1,200 clerkship, for which the last representative of the spoils system was ciphering hard. He worked all day till about 5 o'clock, when the examining board saw it was a hopeless case and gave it up. It was too late to try another, and they were reluctantly obliged to leave this bone for the commission to pick. No such accident happened in any other department.

On the 3d inst., the disbursing clerk of the interior department locked his safe, and when he came to open it on the 5th it could not be opened. The lock was one of those combination time-locks, and he wound the time part of the lock up on the 3d to run until the 5th, the 4th intervening as a holiday, but when the 5th came the clerk could not get into his vault. The most expert machinists and locksmiths in the city were sent for, and worked at it several days but could not open it. Finally on the 15th the officials telegraphed to the manufacturers of the combination lock, and they sent an expert, who had the safe opened within twenty minutes after he commenced work upon the lock, without injury to the safe.

It is reported that the president, through the usual channels, intends to make it a matter of grave consideration, if the recent act of the British parliament should pass into effect, with reference to the cattle trade of the United States. Every means, so far as quarantine relations are concerned, are being provided to insure safety against contagion and it is expected that the English government will give due consideration to our representatives in this matter. The late act is regarded simply as another blow at the American cattle interest abroad, and will be firmly met.

The date of the president's departure from Washington on his trip to Yellowstone park has not yet been fixed. It seems settled, however, that he will leave there about Aug. 1, and will attend the opening of the Louisville exposition before going further west. Arrangements will be made by Lieut. Gen. Sheridan. Secretary Lincoln will accompany the president, and it is said Senator Wade Hampton may be one of the party.

There is a general dissatisfaction on the part of the naval officers at the proposed change in the naval uniforms. Admiral Nichols objects to the abolishment of the folding cocked hats, especially the substitute of the stiff cockade hats. There is a good deal of grumbling and growling at what is termed this fresh official copy of the English uniform.

The increase in postoffices thus far in the new fiscal year indicates a decided falling off in their establishment in the east, and that fully three-fourths of the new offices will be in the west and southwest. At the rate of establishment of offices for the first days of this month, the average made in the last fiscal year of 102 per month will be maintained.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

Articles of incorporation of the Fargo & St. Louis Air Line Railroad company have been filed with the secretary of state at St. Paul. The object of the corporation is to survey, locate, construct and operate a single or double track railroad from some point in Wilkin or Traverse county, Minnesota, in a southerly direction, by the most direct and feasible route to some point on the south line of the state. The principal place of business is at Ortonville. The capital stock is $1,000,000. The corporators are William A. Kindred, Richard S. Tyler, John E. Haggart, Charles E. Sewalt and A. W. Edwards of Fargo, Dak., Cornelius K. Orton of Ortonville and Richard A. Costello of Graceville, Minn.

Secretary Teller issued an order that the Northern Pacific must select its lands within three months and Commissioner Sanborn at St. Paul says the order is of no moment, as the company's indemnity lands were being selected as fast as the government surveys were completed. During the past two months the company, he said, had selected 4,000,000 acres of land, and the whole selection will be made in compliance with Secretary Teller's order, provided the surveys are made in time.

The jury in the case of Julia C. Crockett vs. the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railway company who were given the case found for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $900. This was the third trial of this case, the two preceding juries being unable to agree.

The Milwaukee & St. Paul will shortly run trains from Sioux City via Yankton and Scotland to Marion Junction, to connect with the day passenger.

Burglars blew open the safe of the Little Falls & Dakota railway depot in Sauk Center, and a few dollars in currency and miscellaneous papers were taken.

The railroads earned $26,754,042 in June, those of the Northwest showing a big increase.

The Bayfield branch of the Omaha will be open to Ashland the 22d inst.

Articles of incorporation of the Northern Pacific Express company have been filed with the Minnesota secretary of state. The company is formed under the general statutes of the state, for the purpose of conducting a general express business. The principal place of business is to be St. Paul, and the time of the commencement of the corporation was June 1 last. It is to continue for a period of thirty years. The capital stock is placed at $10,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of $100 each.

On the 13th, Prof. Henry Cragg received a telegram from Sargent county, Dak., announcing that his son, Richard Edward Cragg, had been killed. The telegram was signed George Shields, and the sender advised the young man's father to come on and take charge of the remains. The fact that his death is supposed to have taken place on a claim remote from any town gave rise to the suspicion that he was the victim of foul play.

Mrs. Grace Courtland of Chicago, known in New York as the "Witch of Wall Street," cowhided Will C. Jones of Milwaukee, twenty-five years of age, whom she accused of having seduced her daughter Marie. Jones was struck across the face, neck and shoulders suffering severe wounds. The attack took place at the corner of Broadway and Wisconsin, the most public point in the city. She was accompanied by her daughter.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

Maj. Burt of Des Moines is at La Crosse in the interest of his son, in jail for bigamy. The latter ran away from his home to seek his fortune. At Appleton, Wis., he opened a bagnio and married one of the women occupants. He then went to Green Bay on a spree and shot a man, for which he served two years in a penitentiary. On his release he went to Florence and married another woman of the town, but tiring of her he went to La Crosse and married a third woman. The father then gave him a farm, but wife No. 2 had him arrested. Wives No. 1 and 2 will prosecute their husband jointly. Burt Senior was an officer in the confederate army, is worth $100,000 and says he will give $10,000 to clear his son.

Robert J. Starr of Sioux City, Iowa, shot John Allen, a barber, of Mitchell, Dak., who recently came from Southern Nebraska, the ball struck him in the left side, between the fourth and fifth ribs, making a bad wound. The attending physicians say the ball can't be extracted without sure death, and as the man can only live a short time at the most the operations will not be performed. The parties had been drinking heavily, and Starr fired at Vaneom in his drunken hilarity.

At Darlington, Wis., Martin and McMahon, the ravishers of Lizzie Paulson, were taken before a justice for preliminary examination. A large crowd was in attendance. The boys waived an examination and demanded the amount of bail, at which the court astonished the whole community by admitting the prisoners to bail in the sum of $2,000, which was promptly furnished by their fathers, who immediately took their sons in charge and hurried them away to prevent lynching.

Mrs. Emma F. Knight of New York has brought suit for an absolute divorce from Horatio W. Knight, who was lately treasurer of the Williston & Knight company, of Nos. 74 and 76 Worth street, who fled to Europe last March a defaulter to the extent of $75,000 to $100,000. His thefts caused the failure of the company and of the firm in which he was a partner. Knight is in Paris.

At Bert Prairie, near arm, Ill., a fatal affray occurred between Douglass Gowdy and his sister's husband, Buck Williams, the result of an old family feud. Gowdy went to Williams' residence armed with a knife and cut Williams several times. The latter ran but was followed. He then drew his own knife and stabbed Gowdy to the heart. Gowdy dropped dead.

Ida Boynton a fourteen-year old schoolgirl of respectable parents, recently eloped from Norwalk, Ohio, with Charles Sbendon, a traveling cough-cure man of about fifty years of age. The parents of the girl lost track of the guilty pair until a telegram was received from the runaway girl at Detroit. She had been wronged, and deserted without a cent of money.

Joseph Steinhart, aged nineteen, shot his sixteen-year-old-wife on the 12th inst, while she and another girl were walking on Thirty-fourth street, New York, with two men. He then shot himself. They had been married one year. Jealously was the cause

Dr. Fletcher, a negro herb doctor living near Paducah, Ky., stabbed with a butcher-knife and killed his wife and mother-in-law in the woods, and then made his escape by flight. His children gave the alarm.

Two thugs attempted to hold up James Murnane, in Duluth, who had $400 on his person. One of the robbers hit Murnane with a club, but he drove them off with his revolver.

Last evening Ed. V. Mundy, of George C. Greenwood & Co., Duluth, discovered that thieves had entered his residence and stolen $500 worth of jewelry. No clew to the thieves.

Mrs. Allen Crittenden, a beautiful and accomplished woman of Chicago, who is said to have ensnared and bled numerous wealthy citizens, has been arrested for larceny.

Robert Potee, a well-known gambler of Kansas City, having recently lost $10,000 and been driven out of business, drowned himself in the Missouri.

At Taylor's, Miss., Jesse Sisk shot dead G. W. Mitchell, city marshall. Reports say it was a justifiable act.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

Special: Ex-Secretary Windom goes to Europe in a few days. It is intimated that a portion of his time there will be devoted to the Mexican railway enterprise, of which he is the head. There is a dim suspicion that England, seeing how rapidly American railway enterprises were taking root in Mexico, has concluded it wise to look after business there, and this accounts for the renewal of the relations between England and Mexico, broken off years ago. The controversy regarding Mexican bonds held in England, it is said, about to be satisfactorily terminated, and it is expected that a "tidal wave" of British capital will set toward Mexico.

Gen John Newton, president of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, has been invited to attend the reunion of Parsons' cavalry brigade (confederate), at Dallas, Texas, Aug. 6, and to respond to the toast "The boys who wore the blue." The president of the society, W. G. Veal, says: Our union is not to quarrel, but to meet as brothers, bury all unpleasant recollections of the past, and unite heart and hand in the welfare of our great nation for all time to come.

R. C. Davis of Minneapolis formerly traveling agent of the Buffalo Linseed Oil company, left home on the 14th of June, with only a small sum of money in his possession, and he has not since been seen or heard from. His wife who is in delicate health, and left in destitute circumstances, fears that he has been murdered, as he had no reason for deserting her.

Rev. Dr. Griffiths of New York, found guilty of slandering Bishop Brown in stating that the bishop took a bribe of $100 for the appointment of the Sullivan street charge has written a retraction. He says he was told so, but now he believes the story a malicious falsehood and craves episcopal clemency.

Bishop Whipple and Bishop Beckwith of Illinois, accompanied by William Dawson, R. Warren and M. N. Gilbert, of St. Paul, have gone to the north shore of Lake Superior on a brook trout fishing expedition, and will be absent about two weeks.

The Misses Cadwell of Watertown, N. Y., nieces of the Hon. R. P. Flower of New York, have erected a memorial chapel in the cemetery there at a cost of $15,000, and will present it to the Cemetery association.

Miss Mollie Summers, a handsome young lady of Fort Wayne, said to be the finest amateur organist in Indiana, has eloped with Tom Butler, foreman in a round-house, to be married in a Michigan village.

Mary Ann Chandler, mother of the Secretary of the Navy Chandler, died on the 14th inst., at Concord, N. H., aged eighty-two years.

Mrs. Frank Leslie says she is making $150,000 a year, and she doesn't care to marry anybody to spend it for her.

Walso, an Indian chief, died at Troy, N. Y., last week, at the age of 109.

FOREIGN NEWS GOSSIP.

Mr. Hunt, minister to Russia has become entangled in a difficulty with Admiral Baldwin. In an official report of his visit and the coronation ceremonies the admiral speaks in the highest terms of the treatment from Russian officers, but stress is laid upon his failure to obtain an invitation to the church in which the ceremony took place. The United States Minister is held responsible for his oversight. All of the members of the minister's family were present at the coronation, but the admiral and his party were left out in the cold. The slight was keenly felt but no attention was paid to the matter until the admiral declined to attend the state ball the evening of the coronation. The cause of his declination, promptly given, resulted in a visit of the minister of foreign affairs and the emperor's personal aid, both of whom were profuse in apologies. Finally, every effort was made to recompense the Americans for their disappointment. The admiral, however, in his communication expresses the opinion that Minister Hunt was too intent upon fixing his family and friends to attend to the naval ambassador and his escort. It is understood that the attention of the state department has been directed to the recent questionable conduct of Admiral Pierre, French representative in Tamatave, Madagascar, and that the French government will be asked for an explanation.

London Cable: The outlook of the English harvest is not so favorable as reported last week. Heavy storms have laid the wheat in many places. Still, the general prospects are good. The stocks of wheat and flour in the country are estimated at 3,480,000 quarters, double the amount on hand in July last. The quantity afloat is 1,830,000 quarters against 2,690,000 last July. The amount of the Indian harvest is uncertain.

The speaker of the house of commons has written Bradlaugh, informing him that he will be excluded from the house until he engages not to attempt the oath in disregard to the resolutions of the house. Bradlaugh replied, declaring the action of the house in his case illegal, and says he will endeavor to take his seat in obedience to law, and if expelled will appeal to his constituency.

A Cairo dispatch says it is very apparent that the number of deaths from cholera here has been much greater than stated. It is believed that fifty or sixty deaths have already occurred. The railway from Cairo Alexandria is expected to discontinue operations immediately.

THE CASUALTY RECORD.

There was a severe storm on Wednesday through central Minnesota. At Owatonna the new exhibition building, partly finished, on the state fair grounds, one-third of a mile east of the city park, was blown fourteen feet from its foundation and destroyed. The building was 72x120 feet with 22 foot posts. The grain in the vicinity of Faribault was badly beaten down and the corn cut, but the damage is not necessarily serious.

Nine or ten business houses at Texas were burned the 16th. C. E. Hayden & Co., and Charles Wilkinson, Mrs. Lizzie O'Donnell, N. McLean and John Nix O. L. Thompson and Turner & Co. are among the heavy losers. The losses are from $25,000 to $30,000.

A young man near Creston, Iowa, was bitten by a rattlesnake on last Friday morning. The parents, not knowing what to do, administered about a quart of whisky to the boy in the course of an hour. The boy died the same evening.

Story of a Small Pox Infection.

Early in May a case of small pox developed at St. Michael, Wright county, Minnesota. The physicians did not consider it small pox, and the victim, a servant girl was so treated that she died. Dozens of people were exposed and many soon came down with the dread disease. After a time the state board of health took charge of the matter established a rigid quarantine and placed Dr. N. J. Pinault of Osseo in charge of the district. The doctor has completed his work and made a report which shows that 124 people, living in seventeen houses, were exposed to the disease; that fifty-five of them came down with it, seven had it previously, and sixty-two escaped it. There were six deaths in all, three adults and three children, one of the latter, being quite young. The largest number ill at any one time from May 27, the date when Dr. Pinault took charge, until July 1, when the quarantine was raised, was thirty-two. When it broke out the people were not vaccinated or prepared to avoid the disease in any way, but Dr. Pinault soon made vaccination general and took every precaution to confine the epidemic within the limits, with success. He was seconded in his efforts by the state board of health.

Assassination at Polk City, Iowa.

A strange assassination took place at Polk City, on the 10 inst., R. L. Clingan, the postmaster, being murdered in his store by one of two men who approached him. One said "good evening, gentlemen," and fired his revolver. The shot was fired from the door, the murderer standing just without. Mr. Clingan stood about half way back, just within the center, which is divided by a passage way. D. O. Hanger, who clerks in Mr. Clingan's store, was several feet from the door, and had just removed the cash box for the purpose of taking out the money. His dodging behind the counter was probably all that saved his life. The assassins made no effort to secure any money, but on the contrary precipitately fled when the shot was fired.

It was discovered that the ball passed entirely through Clingan's body and lodged among some paper boxes behind him on the shelf. It was a missile of 44-caliber, and the report of the pistol is said to have been very loud. Clingan was forty-five years of age, and bore an excellent reputation in the county as a business man and gentleman. He had been postmaster of Polk City for the past eight years. Two hours after the murder was known the whole country side was armed and mounted, scouring in every direction. It is known that the murderers have remounted twice since they were seen, and that they are pushing northward. The sheriff is with the pursuers on the hottest trail, and the news indicates a capture, which, in spite of the sheriff, will doubtless provide two cases for the coroner of Boone county. It is generally supposed that this is the second chapter of the mysterious murder of Stubbs, the mayor of the place, last year, who was shot dead by masked men who entered his bedroom. Clingan and he were great friends, and Clingan had been taking an active part in ferreting out his murderers.

Frightful Deeds of a Maniac.

Joliet, Ill., Special: A number of years ago Andrew White was one of the most prominent property holders of Chicago, and made himself an immense fortune, with which he retired to a stock farm near Dwight where he has lived most of the time since. His steady attention to business affected his mind, and he had to be sent to a private asylum. Last week he escaped and speedily made his way to his former home near Dwight on his mission of vengeance, purchasing a large revolver. Reaching the house in the middle of the night, he watched till morning; when he advanced to the front stoop and called out to his wife to come down and welcome him. The family consisting of the wife and two children, aged ten and eighteen years, rushed at once to the porch. He allowed each member of the family to caress him, and a moment after said: "You want my money, my fortune; damn you, take that!" and he sent a bullet crashing through his wife's brain, and as she fell dead on the porch, he turned and buried bullets in the brains of his boy and girl. When he had done this he laid down the revolver and gazed upon the fearful deed he had perpetrated. For a moment the horror of the act seemed to restore his reason, and with a desperate cry he fell upon the corpse of his wife, kissing it and weeping over it. His hallucination returning, however, he dragged the bodies of the dead into the dining-room and laid them out on the table. The murderer then seating himself on the table near his wife, placed the revolver to his head and pulling the trigger fell dead beside her.

John McCullough's Serious Illness.

John McCullough, the great actor, who has been sojourning for the past two months with his friend, Gen. John B. Carson, near Quincy, Ill., where he has been enjoying himself in fishing and field sport, arrived here recently on his way to New York. Up to a few days ago, Mr. McCullough was in excellent health, but he had the misfortune a week since to be out fishing with a party of friends when a severe wind and rain storm overtook them. The actor was thoroughly drenched and a chill followed, which completely prostrated him. Physicians have advised him to abandon all his early engagements for the coming season and attend strictly to the restoration of his health. Mr. William Conner, his manager, was telegraphed to come here for consultation, relative to business matters, and he is here now. Mr. McCullough's physical condition is such, that it has been thought best to cancel all his engagements for the next season, and he will start for New York to-morrow to spend the remainder of the summer at the sea shore.

A Red River Sensation.

Moorehead, Special: William J. Kendrick was brought before the municipal court this morning charged with threatening the life of Maggie Kendrick. They have been married about five years, but have never lived happily together. About six months ago Mrs. Kendrick came to Fargo as a professional musician, and has made quite a reputation there as a pianiste, and is now under engagement with the Redpath Lyceum bureau of Boston. Kendrick came here yesterday, and acting under legal advice and accompanied by his attorney, F. D. Larabee, went to Fargo and took his child from Mrs. Kendrick's home during her absence. He was arrested at Glyndon upon a telegraph warrant, and brought back to this city last evening. While attempting to keep the child in his custody it was kidnapped in a very sensational manner from his room in the Jay Cooke house, and he now claims that he will prosecute the abductor for the crime. Upon his appearance he was released upon bail of $200, Mrs. Kendricks not being able to be present. Socially the case is a parallel to the Rabateau scandal, which has hardly died away, and excitement over it in Fargo and Moorhead is intense.

Settling a Bismarck Claim.

Washington Special: J. J. Jackman, who recently was decided to be the owner of a quarter section of land adjoining Bismarck after a long contest, is in the city. His object is to bring about the ejectment of parties who bought of John W. Plummer, to whom the patent was once issued for hal his claim. The defense has been that these settlers were interested purchasers from Plummer. The secretary of the interior has decided that the claim cannot hold good, as Jackman was the sole occupant of the land at the time they bought of Plummer and had it fenced in. He has directed a letter to the solicitor general stating the facts of the case, and requesting that Jackman be allowed to bring suit in the name of the United States to vacate Plummer's patent and eject the trespassers. The acting attorney general recently, in compliance with Secretary Teller's request, issued an order directing Hugh J. Campbell, the district attorney at Bismarck, to bring suit in the name of the United States, to vacate the patent and secure Jackman's right to the patent. This is the last chapter, probably, in this long contest for a property now very valuable.

Now He is Coming Sure.

Washington Special: President Arthur, with a few invited friends, will leave here about the 1st of August for Chicago, where he will be joined by Gen. Sheridan, Secretary Lincoln and a few other specially invited guests, who, altogether, will constitute a party of about twenty. The party will leave Chicago about August 5, for a thirty day's jaunt in Yellowstone park. The president, Gen. Sheridan and Secretary Lincoln will be the only officials in the party. They go by the Northern Pacific route. A sensational party, consisting of Senators Conger, Cameron of Wisconsin, Vest and Miller of Pennsylvania will go about the same time, but by a different route. The object of their trip is to look into and report on the condition of the lands belonging to the Indians west of the park.

Clinging to the Cross.

Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette: Among the other decorations at the cathedral preparatory to the funeral of Archbishop Purcell, it was determined to have the cross on the steeple draped in mourning. Accordingly Mr. Joseph R. Weston, the famous climber, was called upon to make the perilous ascent of the great marble spire, which he accomplished most successfully last evening just about dusk. While in this elevated position, however, the heavy rain storm, of between 9 and 10 o'clock, burst upon him, and hundreds of anxious spectators watched him from below as now shrouded in almost utter darkness he clung to the cross, and again as the lightnings flashed and the winds blew, his outline could be seen pictured against the mass of white struggling to maintain his hold. It was, indeed, such an experience as Mr. Weston has not had in years, and one that he will probably not care to have repeated in as many more.

Great Fire at Cokato, Wright County, Minnesota.

On the 14th inst., Cokato, Wright County, Minn., sixty-one miles west of St. Paul, on the Breckinridge division of the Manitoba road, met with almost total destruction from fire. The fire seems to have started in a hotel occupied by section men, early on the previous morning. About twenty men were in the building, three of whom were burned to death and several others badly scorched.

The section men who perished were as follows:

Richard Kelly of Waverly.
James Willigman of Montrose.
William Shepherd of Howard Lake.

Kelly and Shepherd were single men, but Willigman leaves a widow and five children. The bodies of the three were burned to a crisp and the remains were forwarded to the friends of the dead this morning.

A wind blowing from different directions caused the fire to spread with great rapidity, and in a short time almost the entire town was in flames. The scenes of suffering and despair were horrible. A large part of the population were driven into the open air half-naked and remained in this condition until late the following forenoon, when kind-hearted people from the country took them in and provided them with food and clothing. The actual loss is difficult of estimation, but it is thought will reach $50,000, with probably half that amount of insurance. Out of twenty-three stores but two were saved.

The losses and insurance are set down as follows

A. W. L. Almquist, hardware and implements, worth $3,000 or $4,000; carries a stock of about $8,000.

Bodin & Johnson, general store, carries a stock of $7,000; insured for $5,500.

Dull, Edmunds, Coulson & Co's elevator; the firm is worth about $30,000; the elevator cost $5 500 in 1881.

Hans England's saloon; he is worth about $3,000.

G. F. Girboch & Co., general store; he lives in Minneapolis.

Peter Zumberg, agricultural implements; carried a small stock.

O. Hendrickson, saloon; worth $1,500 or $2,000.

O. & . Johnson, jeweler, worth from $300 to $500.

King & Bradshaw paid $2,000 for their hotel and furniture a short time ago.

A. A. Snider, general store, carried a small stock—$5,000 to $5,000; insured for $3,000.

P. E. Nelson, boot and shoes; stock worth $2 000 to $3,000.

In the store of Hans England, Otto Oleson, a lumber dealer, did a small business, worth $1,000.

Guy Perkins kept a hotel of small size.

Peterson Bros, general store, had a stock of $6,000 or $7,000.

A. P. Peterson carried a stock of about $3,000 and owned the store and building.

James Ronnion lumber and furniture carried a stock worth $2,000; the store was worth about $6,00.

P. Stevenson, general store carried one of the best stocks in town.

Peter Swenson, wagon-maker, worth $300.

John Tracy, saloon-keeper, carried out a small stock.

Dr. Joe Trow, drugs, carried a stock of $2,000.

P. L. Weberg, furniture; stock of $300.

Arrests for Land Frauds.

Duluth Special: At 10 a. m., on the 14th Assistant United States Marshal Brackett, of St. Paul, arrested R. C. Mitchell, editor of the Duluth Tribune and recently appointed receiver of the land office there, on a charge of complicity in land frauds. The government claims to have a very strong case against Mitchell and H. L. Gordon, the latter also being a party to the conspiracy. Gordon lives in Minneapolis, is quite wealthy and well known, and at one time was a member of the Minnesota legislature. A. K. Lovejoy, proprietor of a shingle manufactory at Thompson station, twenty miles from Duluth, was also a party to the scheme, but as he has turned informer and will be used by the government as a witness, the prosecution will be direct against Mitchell and Gordon.

Gov. Marshall worked up the case. The specific charge is that Mitchell, Gordon and Lovejoy employed twenty-seven men to enter some 4 450 acres of land under the preemption law, make final proof and then transfer the lands to them. Of course, this proceeding is a violation of the letter and spirit of the preemption law, though it is not an unheard-of practice in the Northwest. Mitchell claims that his part in it was innocent, and that his arrest is inspired by wicked men who want to prevent his confirmation as register.

Some thirty overt acts are challenged to have been done to effect the object of the conspiracy. The laws required but one overt act to make the crime complete. It is asserted that the scheme was for Gordon to furnish the money, Lovejoy to inspect and select the lands, and Mitchell share as partner.

The land embraced in this controversy touches for the most part on Vermillion lake. It is estimated that there are 6,000,000 feet of pine on the twenty-seven claims. The government officials assert they will push the case to the end. Gordon will be arrested Monday, or as soon as a warrant can be served on him. It is alleged that Lovejoy turned informer because of the failure of Gordon and Mitchell to make good some $400, which he (Lovejoy) had invested, and an attempt on the part of Mitchell and Gordon to freeze Lovejoy out of the partnership. Mr. Mitchell claims that his arrest is merely to prevent his taking the office to which he has been appointed.

Pennsylvania Republican Convention.

The Pennsylvania State Republican Convention was held at Harrisburg on Wednesday. A more harmonious convention, considering the incongruous elements, was never held in the state. It began by making Col. Todd of Carlisle its temporary chairman, recognizing the Garfield element, Col. Todd having been a Garfield elector in 1880. This was followed up by the unanimous selection of John Cessna, of Bedford, as permanent chairman, the stalwart element being embodied in Cessna. On taking the Chair, Mr. Cessna said: Let all stalwarts prove themselves independents; let all independents show themselves stalwarts; and henceforth let us have neither stalwarts or independents, but only republicans.

On the sixth ballot William Linsey was nominated for state treasurer, receiving 140 out of 240 votes. Mr. Linsey is the present cashier of the state treasury.

On the fifth ballot, Jerome B. Niles of Tioga was nominated for auditor general, receiving 157 votes out of 243, his principal opponent being Col. T. J. Grimeson, at present in the internal revenue service. These are the only offices to be chosen this year. The only special feature of the platform, is a plank which declares that after the national debt is paid, as fast as the conditions will permit, the surplus revenue should be distributed among the several states, on the basis of population, to relieve them from local taxation and to enable them to educate their people. The other resolutions declare for protection, advise an economical administration of the government, ask congress to provide for the redemption of the trade dollar, protest against pauper immigration, endorse the party and the president and condemn, the Democracy of the State, pat civil service reform on the back, and proclaim the necessity of certain reforms in the administration of State and municipal governments.

The Failure of a Week.

Bradstreet's Journal says: There were 140 failures in the United States reported to Bradstreet's during the past week ending 14th four more than the preceeding week, sixteen more than than the corresponding week of 1882, and fifty more than the same week of 1881.

Hunting for Heiresses.

Italy is swarming with nobility, whose principal business it is to marry American and English heiresses. The nobles of Italy are, as a rule, poor as church mice. Count! The woods are full of them. You couldn't throw a stone without its descending upon the head of a count, and one couldn't put very heavy stones to a much better use. They rather prefer an opera singer or a celebrated actress to an American fortune—provided the artist has saved her money and has as much as the American girl to start with. For when the American girl's dowry is gone; that is the end of it; but the singer or actress' talent is a mine that may be worked many years. It doesn't matter that her reputation may be somewhat soiled, and that all she wants a husband for is a protection for a lover as much as for the title. The worst of them can marry a nobleman at any time, who will be the most accommodating of husbands so long a he is provided with money enough. And when she tires of him completely and is fixed in her position, he is to be gotten rid of quite as easily as he was taken on. As in the case of marriage, it is only a question of money—a certain sum paid down, and he consents to leave her to herself and her last fancy. They are a most complaisant set of men. It isn't necessary to inherit the title at all. You can buy it if you choose, with a castle and morgaged estate thrown in. A real nobleman, an English nobleman, who can show descent from a long line of robbers, is bad enough, but these pinchback Italian vermin, these moustached, scented, beringed fellows who are trying to trade their titles for the means to gamble upon—they are enough to turn the stomach of almost anybody's sense. Old Jones, with his oil-smelling dollars, is a prince beside them. His money was honestly earned, at all events, and he has done the world some good. What these fellows were crerted for is as much a mystery as the use of mosquitoes or rattlesnakes.

A Novelty to Actors is to See the Play.

"Why do actors, whenever they are not playing, at once rush to the theater to see somebody else play, instead of getting away from theatres altogether?" is often asked. The fact is, actors and actresses have naturally a strong love for the drama; they like to see good performances, and have very little chance for doing so. Sitting "in front" is a radical change from "being in the bill." People on the stage know, as a general thing, almost nothing of the scenes they are not in. Some scenes are never witnessed, even from the wings, by the actors who play in the piece hundreds of nights; and a performance seen from the wings is very unsatisfactory. It doesn't seem at all as it does from the auditorium. Therefore, to sit "in front" and see a play through is as much a novelty and treat to the actor as it is to the average theater-goer. —[Boston Post.

THE MARKETS.

ST. PAUL.

FLOUR—Steady and unchanged. Quotations: Patents, Orange Blossom, $6.50@6.75; Red Cross, straights, $5.75@6; Capitol family, $5@5.25; Bakers', XXXX, $4.25@4.50; in barrels, 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality. Rye flour, $4@4.25 per bbl. Graham, $5@5.25 per bbl.

WHEAT—The market was quotably firm, mainly on outside influences, rather than by reason of active trading. General movements light and but little done, there being only a limited consumption inquiry. No. 1 hard, $1.09 bid, $1.11 asked; year, $1.03 asked; No. 1, $1.07 asked; No. 2 hard, $1.04 bid, $1.07 asked.

CORN—Dull and steady. Quotations unchanged. Receipts fair. No. 2, 50c asked; year, 46c bid No. 3, 45c bid; rejected, 43c asked.

OATS—The market was fully strong at the quotations, some of which were shaded lower from Saturday's figures. Parties wanted to buy, but could not reach the sellers, on prices. Others wanted to sell, but would not yield to buyers' prices. Between the two classes there was not much done, some buyers showed considerable confidence in futures, by offering to purchase freely. After the call some late members tried to do a little trading, thus proving the existence of some interest in the market. Quotations: No. 2 mixed, 30c bid, 31c asked; July, 29c bid, 30c asked; September and year, 28c bid, 30c asked; No. 3 mixed, 28½c bid; No. 2 white, 32c bid; No. 3 white, 30c bid; rejected, 30c asked. Sales: 5,000 bu No. 2 mixed, year, p. t.

MINNEAPOLIS.

BILL NYE ON BOXING.

As Illustrated by Personal Experien in the Manly Art.

I have just returned from a little tw handed tournament with the gloves have filled my nose with cotton-was that I shall not soak this sketch in as I write.

I needed a little healthful ex and was looking for something would be full of vigorous enth and at the same time promote the h ful flow of blood to the muscles. was rather difficult. I tried most e thing, but failed. Being a sociable ing (joke) I wanted other people to me exercise, or go along with me I exercised. Some men can go aw a desert isle and have fun with d bells and a horizontal bar, but to would seem dull and commonplac a while, and I would yearn for humanity.

Two of us finally concluded t billiards, but we were only amateu and the owner intimated that he wou want the table for the Fourth of July, we broke off in the middle of the fir game and I paid for it.

Then a younger brother said he had set of boxing-gloves in his room, and s though I was the taller and had long arms, he would hold up as long as I could and I might hammer him until gained strength and finally got well.

I accepted this offer because I ha often regretted that I had not made m self familiar with this art, and also because I knew it would create a thrill o interest and fire me with ambition, an that's what a hollow-eyed invalid need to put him on the road to recovery.

The boxing-glove is a large fat mitte with an abnormal thumb, and a strin at the wrist by which you tie it on, that when you feed it to your adv he can not swallow it and chok self. I had never seen any gloves before, but my brother sai were soft and wouldn't hurt an So we took off some of our raime put them on. Then we shook That was to show that we were friendl and would not slay each other.

My brother is a great deal younge than I am, and so I warned him not t get excited and come for me with anything that looked like wild ungovernable fury, because I might, in the hea of debate, pile his jaw up on his forehead and fill his ear full of sore thum He said that was all right, and he woul try to be cool and collected.

Then we put our right toes close t gether, and I told him to be on hi guard. At that moment I dealt him terrific blow, aimed at his nose, bu through a clerical error of mine, it wen over his shoulder, and spent itself i the wall of the room, shattering a sma holly-wood bracket, for which I pa him three dollars and seventy-five cen afterward. I did not wish to buy t bracket, because I had two at ho but he was arbitrary about it an bought it.

We then took another athletic ture, and in two seconds the air wa of poulticed thumb and buckskin ten. I soon detected a change to one in where my brother could sm it, but I never knew just whe struck, for at that moment I ra against something with the pit o stomach that made me throw up sponge along with some other things.

My brother then proposed that take off the gloves, but I thought I had not sufficiently punished him, and that another round would complete the conquest, which was then almost within my grasp. I took a bismuth powder, and squared myself; but in warding off a le hander I forgot about my adversary right, and ran my nose into the midd of his boxing glove. Fearing that I ha injured him, I retreated rapidly on m elbows and shoulder-blades to the corner of the room, thus giving him ampl time to recover. By this means my younger brother's features were saved and are to-day as symmetrical as my own.

I can still cough up pieces of boxing gloves, and when I close my eyes I can see calcium lights and blue phosphorescent gleams across the horizon; but I am thoroughly convinced that there is no physical exercise which yields the same amount of health and elastic vigor to the puncher that the manly art does. To the punchee, also, it affords a large wad of glad surprise and nose bleed, which can not be hurtful to those who hanker for the pleasing nervous shock, the spinal jar, and the pyrotechnic concussion.

This is why I shall continue the exercises after I have practiced with a mule or a cow-catcher two or three weeks, and feel a little more confidence in myself.—Detroit Free Press.

Disappearance of Dieases.

We have all been surprised that malarial fever, after having disappeared from New England for nearly two centuries, should return again to it with its old-time vigor. Formerly leprosy was known to us mainly through the Bible; now it is not a stranger even to our own land.

At the present day gout is a common disease only in England. It was once common throughout Europe; and the skeletons dug from the ashes of Pompeti show that the Romans were familiar with its torments.

Few persons away from our larger seaports ever saw a case of typhus fever; but once its deadly ravages were not by any means rare among us. Diptheria seems to us a new disease; but the most ancient medical writers describe it in terms exactly applicable to it now.

Among the modern Turks there is a deadly disease that begins with fever, followed soon by a profuse sweating and complete prostration, often resulting in death within a few hours.

In the beginning of the sixteenth century, the same disease prevailed in England five or six times, carrying off over thirty-thousand victims. Queen Anne Boleyn was attacked by it, but recovered to fall by the axe. Cardinal Wolsey had four attacks of it. Henry VIII. shifted his court from place to place to escape it.

It was then largely limited to England and was known abroad as "The English Sweat." That there was a cause for it, is plain from the manner in which Erasmus wrote to Wolsey. "Chambers built in such a way as to admit of no ventilation, floors laid with white clay, and covered with rushes, occasionally removed, but so imperfectly that the bottom layer is left undisturbed sometimes for twenty years, harboring expectorations, vomitings, ale-droppings, scraps of fish, and other abominations not fit to be mentioned."

The Boston Medical and Surgical nal adds, "The narrow streets the receptacles for all garbage, the surface sewers slowly rolled contents towards an already poluted river." Here were the sources of this disease; but cleanliness and better habits of living have caused its disappearance.—Youth's Companion.

F. W. Woodward, a farmer of Marshal county, is building a 40,000-bushel commercial elevator at Warren. Warren already possesses a 30,000-bushel elevator, and this new enterprise indicates that a large amount of grain is expected from this year's crops.

I, P. J. McGuire, County Auditor of said County do solemly swear that the list hereto attached is a correct list of taxes remaining delinquent for the year One Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty-two (1882) upon real estate in said County.

P. J. McGUIRE,
County Auditor, Polk County.

Subscribed and sworn to before me June 30th, 1883.

THOS C. SHAPLEIGH,
Clerk of District Court.

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT COURT, Polk County, Minnesota. }

I, Thos. C. Shapleigh, Clerk of said District Court, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing list and Auditors certificate was duly filed in this office on the 15th day of June 1883.

THOS. C. SHAPLEIGH,
Clerk of the District Court Polk County, Minn.

OFFICE OF COUNTY AUDITOR, Polk County, Minnesota. }

The above and foregoing copy of the list of taxes delinquent on the 1st day of June A. D. 1883, on the real estate in said County, with notice hereto attached, received from the Clerk of the District Court, in and for said County of Polk on this 30th day of June 1883.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 19

Herb has the boss 5 cent cigar. Call for the Cluster.

Coles Circus next Saturday. Go and have some fun.

Mr. C. A. Chiniquy has returned from his sad journey to Chicago.

Last and only appearance of Mme. Camilla Urso in this city at Ericsson's Hall, Tuesday July 31st.

Smedes & Vance are burning a large brick kiln. They will be ready for delivery in a few days.

Smedes & Vance have put in a large water wheel on the bank of the river to draw water for their brick yard.

Everybody is of the opinion that we are having rather cold weather, but it is just the weather we need for wheat.

John Van Tuyl, Henry Kemp D. S. Horton and others, from Maple Lake were in the city enjoying city life this week.

Alex McKinnon has bought the St. Germain Property on Houston Avenue and intends to build a fine residence there.

The editor of the Warren Sheaf gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday morning. He is en-route to the Editorial convention.

The Congregational church is being put up as rapidly as men can do it it looks like we were going to have a fine church soon.

Ole Omlie came over from Grafton this week and on his return he took that fine Norman horse that has been at Bjoin's stables all summer.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Pirnie, of Cleveland Ohio, father and mother of Mrs. J. B. Copeland are spending a few weeks with their daughter in this city.

The ladies of the Episcopal church held an ice cream festival on Tuesday evening last which was a grand success. We are told that the receipts were $110.

Mr. Jas. Reed, Lucius O'Brien and Bill Haney have gone out to the withdrawn lands to spy the land, and, if suited will squat upon a quarter section each.

George Heywood returned from a trip to Devils Lake country having had a fine time fishing in the lake. He thinks Creel's City leads anything out that way.

The Board of County Commissioners meet as a Board of Equalization on Monday and are deep in the mysteries of the tax business. They have a big job on hand.

If you see anything especially good in this issue lay it to us boys—the old man has gone to St. Paul to attend the convention of the big moguls and try to learn something about the business.

Munn Brothers have struck a fine flowing well at a depth of about 150 feet. It throws quite a large stream 4 feet above the ground and we should judge will give down about 100 barrels per day.

Our old time friend O. L. Larson, from Audubon, was in the city on Wednesday. While here he gave the JOURNAL a pleasant call. O. L. Says that we've got the boss city of the Northwest.

Just received at Herb's place on corner of Main and Robert streets fruits of all kinds. Talking about fruits puts us in mind that if you want a fine smoke call at Herb's place. He keeps the best cigars in the city.

S. W. Ritchie has been sawing up a few feet of logs at the mill to clear up the docket. He has purchased about 1,000,000 feet of logs of the big Indian chief—what's-his-name, and intends to move his mill to Thief River to saw it.

We are pleased to note that Mr Thos. Ratchford is so far recovered from his severe illness as to be able to be out on the streets again. He has been very sick for a long time, got thin as a shad but is picking up rapidly.

The big tax list, the sickness of our foreman and the absence of the boss who goes to attend the Editorial Convention in St. Paul this week causes our local columns to look somewhat slim but we trust that next week everything will be all o. k.

E. T. Wetter, Special agent for the Camilla Urso Grand Concerts, gave the JOURNAL a pleasant call on Wednesday. Mme. Camilla Urso will appear at Ericsson's Hall on Tuesday July 31st. Reserved seats at Tom Morris' Jewelry Store.

"Pi" sends us an interesting communication from Angus, this week and threatens to do so more. All right, we shall be glad to receive one of that same sort every week and will take extra pains not to "pi" a single letter. Thanks, send us more "pi."

Came to my premises on Monday morning July 16th, one Bay Mare, with left front and hind leg, white above fetlock and star in forehead, had on bridle. The owner is requested to call, prove property, pay charges and take her away. Ole Nelson Fenset, Town of Roame.

It was either a very sharp trick (?) or a blunder when that little chap, on Sunday last chucked a pool check into the Sabbath School contribution box However, it will pass this time but does not want to occur again as the color of the lad's hair is known and it might cause him unpleasant feelings when called upon to explain publicly.

St. Paul Globe: Arrangements are completed by which a saw mill of 15,000,000 feet capacity will be built at Crookston, in the Red river valley. It is expected that 5,000,000 feet will be cut this season. This is the first practical step towards utilizing, in a small way, the immense pineries around Red Lake, naturally tributary to Crookston.

The Star Concert Course.

The Boston Herald says: An immense audience, limited only by the size of the hall, last night greeted Camilla Urso and an efficient support of artists, consisting of Mr. Holst Hansen, the great Danish baritone, Mr. F. Sonnekalb, pianist, and the distinguished reader and elocutionist, Prof. Wm. Mason Evans. An attractive programme was presented, and well rendered. The efforts of Mme. Urso were in her best style, and created a perfect furor. Her selections were a sonata by Rust, and the Witches' Dance by Paganini. The artists were the victims of the encore rage, and were obliged to double the programme, which they good-naturedly did, to the delight and satisfaction of the audience.

PARTIES DESIRING INSURANCE.

We represent the following old and reliable Fire Insurance Companies:

For Sale

A very large beautiful MARE COLT born May 17th last year, weighing 900 Pounds. Apply at Railroad Land office [6 tf]

Ed. Walsh has been setting up the cigars this week all on account of a eleven pound boy who came to live in Ed's new house on Thursday last. Ed says that he can not see that his crop is afficted by the drouth, a bit.

At Last

The long wished for rain arrived. On Friday, about six o'clock it began to fall, continuing through the night in copious showers. Although late it is worth thousands of dollars to this country.

We are glad to notice the interest that farmers are taking in the mustard business. In every field where this pest has appeared some one has been pulling it out. The result will be that mustard will be very much disheartened and will doubtless lose its grip in this county.

The Young Folks Concert on Thursday evening last was a grand success in everything except attendance. The little folks all did splendidly and deserved more encouragment. Notable among the pieces were the songs of seven, the cat operatta, tableau of the sun worshippers and many others, all well rendered. The total receipts were about $12.

The town of Fairfax, having tried one grader and found it to be very good has bought another and has two graders at work upon roads and ditches. The result will be that Fairfax will be the boss town for good roads and ditches. If every town would do the same we should soon have some good roads in this county.

The Grand Forks Plaindealer is mad all over at the defeat of their base ball club at Ada, and vents its spite in a tirade against the Ada people generally. As near as we can get at it by disinterested outsiders who saw the whole affair the G. F. boys went down there expecting to have a walk-over, and were the worst used up club in existence at their defeat. They take a mitey small way to crawl out if the screed in Thursday's Plaindealer is their work.

So far, Crookston has fortunately escaped the ravages of that dreaded monster the Fire Fiend, but we know not at what hour he may appear in our midst. The only way to meet this terrible foe is by good, reliable Insurance. Look over our Million List of staunch, fire-tested companies and make your selection before you have cause to regret a loss.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELLA Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagamie, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagees, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 26th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 428 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100,) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars, ($558,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the land and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 10th day of August A. D. 1883, at two o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated June 27th, A. D. 1883.

Avoid Farm Mortgages.

Mr. H. A. Haigh, gives the following wholesome advice on mortgages to farmers in the American Agriculturist for August.

Mortgages are necessary and beneficial in civilized society, but there are unpleasant features about them. They often enable a man to accomplish what he could not otherwise do, and they also often involve a man who would have been otherwise successful. They often enable a man to get out of trouble which he could not otherwise avoid, and they perhaps equally often make miserable a life which would would have otherwise been happy. It is easy to get them on the farm, but it is not always so easy to get them off. Farm mortgages are about the best investment that capital can find. Investors generally like them. They partake of the nature, permanence, and other substantial qualities of real property, but are relieved from many burdens imposed upon land.

Therefore:—1. Do not mortgage the farm unless it seems absolutely necessary. But, as a general rule is less valuable than a particular one, it may be well to specify, by adding: 2. Do not mortgage to build a fine house. By so doing, you will have to pay money for an investment which does not bring money. 3. Do not mortgage the farm to buy more land. Where there is absolute certainty that more can be made out of the land than the cost of the mortgage. this rule might not apply. But absolute certainty is rare, mistaken calculation is common. 4. Do not mortgage the farm unless you are sure of the continued fertility of its soil. Many persons borrow with an expectation of the land's virginity only, which, on failing, may leave the land less productive, and the means of repayment thus be removed. In this way trouble begins which may result in the loss of the farm. Keep very clear of mortgages.

In the Hay and Harvest Field.

People drink too copiously of ice-cold water, and every summer the list of deaths from this cause is a long one. Excessive drinking of ice-water becomes as much of a habit as some other forms of drinking. If ice-cold water be used to reduce the temperature of ordanary well-water, "half-and-half," it will be found to quench thirst quite as readily as when taken into the stomach at the melting point of ice (32°), and there will be no danger of sunstroke and "sudden prostration in the hay field." Still better than ice-watr is some prepared drink, to be taken in moderate quantities. Nothing is better for those who work in the hay and harvest field than the old-fashioned "Switchell." This is water, sweetened with molasses, to which are added vinegar and ground ginger. We do not know of any definite proportions, as the ingredients are usually mixed "according to taste." It is a most refreshing draught, and if cooled by abding a moderate quantity of ice, the ginger prevents any unpleasant effects. Another capital drink for workmen in the field is "Tea Punch." Make stong tea, sweeten it, and then squeeze into it the juice of one or more lemons. This may also be cooled by adding ice in moderate quantities, and those who like tea at all, will prefer it to any other harvest drink. Strong coffee, with sugar and milk, placed on ice until well cooled, is an excellent drink for the fiele.—American Agriculturist for August.

Meet Your Obligations Promptly.

If a man desires credit he should endeavor always to meet his pecuniary obligations. If he at once acquires the reputation of "staving off" those whom he owes he will soon find himself in a condition that he cannot borrow a dollar without first class security, or buy a bill of goods without cash.

The man who never pays his honest debts until he is obliged to will find it a difficult and almost impossible thing to carry on a successful business. Subterfuge and excuses for delaying the payment of an obligation after due are extremely hurtful to a man's reputation. Business men with whom he deals soon learn of all such tricks and devices for failing to pay up as per agreement, and when once the game is played upon them no second opportunity for repeating the offence is given. The fact of a man being a poor paying customer soon becomes notorious, and after two or three "dodging" operations he finds himself utterly without credit when he orders goods or go to market for them in person.

Meet your obligations then, promptly. Never promise to pay a bill at a specified time unless you are positive that you will be abundantly able to meet it. Do not trust to luck; let your word be as sacred as your bond, and you will have true friends about you everywhere, who will stand by you when you are in trouble and trust you when you are in urgent need of credit whereby to carry on your business.—Le Sueur County News.

The Proper Time to Cut Grass

The report of the analytical chemist of the Department of Agriculture, summing up the results of analyses of nearly all the cultivated grasses, says: "It is apparent, then, that in most cases the time of bloom, is the fittest for cutting grasses in order to obtain the most nourishment and largest relatively profitable crops, and for the following reasons: The amount of water has diminished and the shrinkage will therefore be less. The weight of the crop will be the largest in proportion to the nutritive value of its constituents. The amount of nitrogen not present as albuminoids will be at its lowest point fiber will not be so excessive as to prevent digestion, and the nutritive ratio will be more advantageous. If cut earlier the shrinkage is larger, although the fiber is less and albumen is a little larger. The palatability may be increased, but the total nutriments to the acre will not be so large and the nutritive ratio will be more abnormal. The disadvantages of late cutting are evident in the increase of fiber, destroying the digestibility of the nutriments and the falling off of the albumen by conversion into amides. This is not made up by the larger crop cut.

It Pays to Hire plenty of Good Help.

It pays to keep help enough to do everything in the best possible manner, and just when it ought to be bone; it pays to run a farm to its full capacity.

If you had hired more help, couldn't you have prepared your wheat ground a little better last fall? Couldn't you have cut your wheat before it got so ripe as to shell, or before the straw became worthless for feed? During the hurry of haying and harvest, couldn't you have saved your potatoes from going to the bugs, and got some of the weeds out of that corn? Couldn't you have got out that stone in the spring, and saved that costly break to your reaper? Couldn't you have got out those stumps that hinder too much when you are plowing and cultivating, and underdrained those wet spots where your wheat was killed out? Couldn't you have cut that clover before it got so ripe as to be almost worthless for feed, and had fat horses this winter instead of bare ribs?

A farmer told me only last week that he lost $100 by letting a piece of grass stand too long last summer that it was no better than straw for feed; $10 more paid out for help would have saved it. Another said his hay was like medicine to his cows. With more help he could have cut it early, cured it nicely, doubled its value, and saved most of his feed bill. Two or three dollars" worth more labor spent on your wheat ground, might have paid you, not only the capital back, but a profit that the merchant and manufacturer never obtain.—Ohio Farmer.

Raising Pork

There is no question as to the profits in raising pork, if the right kind of hogs are selected, but there is the point where a great many breeders differ. The Berkshires are the only kind of hogs worth raising; the Poland China will claim the same superiority for their special breed, and so on through the list. The fact is, there is but little difference between the two breeds named, and either will richly repay for care and good feeding. In feeding corn, if you can sell your pork at 4 cents per pound on foot, you will realize about 50 cents per bushel for your corn. But it is not one-half so profitable to feed corn as it is to feed root crops, especially carrots.

To make cheap pork, one should have plenty of room for his hogs, with plenty of good clean bedding, clean eating troughs and pure water to drink. It is a mistake, and one that often leads to serious results, to make the hog a scavenger for the farm. Much, if not all, of the diseased pork comes directly from this abuse of the hog. He will eat filth and slops if he is obliged to, but enjoys wholesome food and pure water, occasionally a little charcoal, or small lumps of soft coal, and plenty of salt, and he will pay his keeping and a handsome profit.—Dakota Farmer.

American Wheat in Italy.

The New York Herald says: "Instead of imposing an import duty upon American wheat, Italy should favor in every legitimate way its introduction. Fertile in soil and favored by climate, her wheat fields make but a small return, averaging not more than twelve bushels to the acre. The causes of this are to be found in the very primitive methods of cultivation still in general use, by which the real richness of the ground is not developed, and in the almost unbearable burdens of taxation imposed upon the people, which discourage the application of capital to farming and prevent the adoption of modern improved forms of agricultural machinery. What the Italian peasant needs is good, wholesome food, and this in many parts of Italy cannot be had. The wants of sufficient nourishment of a high quality and the many privations which the peasant proprietor endures have engendered that strange and terrible disease, the Pellagra. Cheap grain is what Italy requires, and, while America has plenty to spare, let her buy it, giving in exchange the produce of her vine and olive."

MONEY TO LOAN.

The American Agriculturist For August opens with a spirited full-page engraving of the two fastest teams in the world. We allude to Maude S and Aldine, belonging to Mr. Wm. H Vanderbilt, and Edward and Swiveller," belonging to Mr. Frank Work. This picture, drawn from life for the American Agriculturist by Edward Forbes, is the only one ever executed. The teams are in motion, and present a most animated breezy appearance. Among the leading writers are: Dr. Stockwell, The Raccoon; A. B. Allen Improvement of Jersey Cattle; H. A. Haigh, Avoid Farm Mortgages; J. M. Stahl, Early Plowing for Wheat; Joseph Harris, Twenty years in Swine Husbandry; Dr. Ceo. Thurber, Various Horticultural Topics, etc,; Dr. B. D. Halsted, the Liver Fluke, Black knot etc.; Orange Judd, Comments on the Markets, etc.; Prof. A. J. Cook, Bee Notes; S. B. Reed, A Double $2,500 Cottage, with four Engravings; H. A. Hammond, A Dairy Ice-House, Illustrated; F. Grundy, A Root Cellar, with eight Engravings; Mary Branch, The Six-winged Butterfly; E. E. Rexford, A Cabbage Cutter. Alfred Thumble fully illustrates "Tropical Farming," and G. R. Halm attractively presents "Summer Days in the Country." Among the 100 original Engravings are those of the Cotton Flower and Boll; A Shoulder Yoke; New York Weevil; "Club-footed" Cabbage; Fruit Evaporator; Wooden Bridges; Chicken Yard, and various Farm Devices. Among Plants and Flowers, we find Illustrations of the Mourning Iris; Snakes' Tongue Orchis; Paper Mulberry, Coltsfoot, and Cocoa Plum. The Household and Boys' and Girls' Columns are filled with interesting and valuable matter, fully illustrated. Sundry Humbugs continue to find space given them in this sterling home Journal. The prairie farmers have been favored with a call from one of the editors, who writes at length of his tour through many of the Western States. Published by the Orange Judd Co., 751 Broadway, New York. $150 per year; single numbers 15 cents.

Andrews' Bazar for August is by all odds the handsomest number ever published. It is evident that it has fallen into hands who know what the ladies want in a fashion paper, and knows how to publish it. Its low price (only $1 a year) places it in within the reach of all, while its styles, stories and table of contents generally, compare very favorably with those of the higher cost Foreign and American publications of its class. Published by The American Bazar Co., 202 Broadway, N. Y.

Pioneer Press: Business men in the East seems to be thoroughly in earnest in their attempts to boycott the trade dollar. New York took the lead in the movement, and Washington, Philadelphia and other Pennsylvania towns immediately followed suit. Yesterday the price of trades ranged from 85 to 90 Secretary Folger said yesterday to a Pioneer Press correspondent that he was powerless to act, but that congress must provide a remedy, and would next winter be urged to come to the rescue. In the meantime the people will, doubtless, be chary of accepting the unpopular coin.

Looking Out The Back Door

A friend of ours wished to hire a farmer for a wealthy neighbor, and we mentioned one who was wanting an engagement. Knowing that our friend had been to see this farmer, we asked the result. His reply was, in substance: "Yes, I went there; I went around to the back door and came away, knowing that he would not suit." The front doors of many farm-houses are rarely opened. The back door is in constant use. One need not go far in and locality, to find the outlet of the kitchen sink ending in a sort of ditch, which is supposed to carry off the waste water, but which only allows it to soak away and saturate the ground near the back of the house. The seldom used front door is opened when a small coffin is to be taken out. The minister speaks of "the mysterious dispensations of Providence." They are not at all mysterious. Bad sink drains at the back of the house are sure to bring typhoid fever and other sickness. Let the back door surroundings be looked to. If nothing better can be done, carry the kitchen wastes to a cesspool a distance from the house. Let them soak away far below the surface. Prohibit all throwing out of slops at the back door. The ground soon becomes charged with matters that ferment and breed disease. Where pigs are kept, and that includes every farm, there should be a pail, to receive all animal and vegetable matters and daily emptied. Nothing of the kind should be thrown out at the back of the house. Where there is such a disease-breeding sink spout as we have mentioned, let provisions be at once mad to carry off the water to a cesspool and cover up the saturated ground with dry earth. Let the back yard to the house always be kept scrupulously neat.—American Agriculturist for August.

Rev. Roberts takes a vacation trip east. We trust his visit will give him needed rest.

The Ada boys were up in force to see the circus. They are a jolly team, when they get away from home.

Messrs. Crocker, Cundy and Utzinger, of St. Hilaire, were in the city this week gazing upon our improvements.

Mr. D. T. Herriott, of Edna, dropped in on Tuesday to report that crops are recuperating fast in that vicinity.

Capt. Soule was in from Russia Farm on Monday and reports that his wheat is in splendid condition bidding fair to be the best he ever raised on his farm.

Miss Dolly Bunnell arrived on Sunday for a brief visit with mama, papa and the Pets. She is getting a big girl now, having grown muchly during her absence.

Mr. F. J. Duffy has picked up the East Frand Forks Courier where C. H. Hoge dropped it and will make it keep up its establishedreputation as a bright ocal paper.

Miss Lizzie Malone and Mrs. Wm. Guse lintend to leave for their old home, Minneapolis, on Saturday next for a few weeks visit. Bon Vyge, and a pleasant time, their friends say.

Mr. A. A. Olds brought in a sample of wheat from his farm on section 21, Fanny, saying that he has 150 acres same as sample. The sample shown was over 3½ feet and well headed out.

Ed. Carruth reports that he is having a fine time with his brother Linn, who is away off out of the world at Pasqua, N. W. T. He enjoys everything except having to go thirty miles for postage stamps.

Conductor J. B. Copeland and his father-in-law, Mr. J. Pirney took a trip to Devil's Lake this week. The JOURNAL force rejoices in the success of the expedition in the shape of a mammoth pickerel which they sent over upon their return.

Elsewhere appears a notice from F. T. Haseltine to his many patrons and friends, assuring them that he is still alive to all their wants in the nursery line. F. T. is a rustler and what he can't get for you in the line of a plant, tree or shrub isn't worth having.

The County Board has been in session this week and many important acts were "passed" by a large majority. We were unable to secure a full report for this issue. This morning the Board resumes the equalization business. They are determined to see justice done in this tax business.

Hack & Gallasch have purchased the Sargeant & Lewis stock which is nice and fresh and the boys, having both escaped being married this time, bob up serenely, ready and willing to wait upon their customers with their usual bland smile. Drop in and see how nicely the boys look since they (didn't) got married.

We took occasion to interview Dept. Sheriff Hopkins' wheat on Tuesday and brought away a sample which measures four feet, showing the wheat to be well stooled and well headed. The whole field averages well and while the sample we secured may have been among the very best we took no particular pains to get the longest but calculated to get about an average sample.

Charlie Kretzschmar was down from the Falls this week, went down to Fargo on Monday and was skirmishing around our streets in a mysterious manner on Tuesday with several big guns. When approached by our reporter with the usual probe—"why is this thus?" he replied "ah, sure! sure!! But please don't mention it in the paper, that is, not at present." There is a big deal in the wind of which we may have occasion to speak hereafter.

On Wednesday, Dr. J. H. Thomas brought in a fine sample of wheat from his farm in the Thief River country over four feet high with long heads which he says is an average sample of Thief River wheat. If that is correct they have some 25 and 30 bushels per acre wheat up there. He also showed us some red-top grass that had been cut by a mower which was five feet three inches high and estimated to turn three tons to the acre. "Them fellows" must live in clover up there.

Our good old friend Damon Dodge, of Beltrami, brought us some samples from the vegetable and cerial kingdom on Monday that rejoiced our heart greatly. He has three acres of corn that is now in silk, some of the stalks having four ears upon them. It was planted May 28th and will soon be ready for roast ears or "bilin." He has 75 acres of No. 1 Hard wheat the sample he brought being 49 inches long with heads from 4½ to 5 inches. One stool contained 21 stalks. Onions he brought, some of which were 8½ inches in circumference and beets that beat all, being 20 inches long and 15½ inches in circumference. Mr. Dodge has one of the finest gardens in Polk County which allows him to live like a prince on the fat of the land.

Charlie Seely has returned and has brought along a lot of fine pictures.

Mrs. C. H. Seely intends to leave for a visit to friends in Minneapolis next week, to be gone a week or two.

The Ada house, since Frank Bergquest took control again is a first-class house. Frank knows how to keep hotel.

Cole's circus was the best of its kind ever in this city and was enjoyed by all. Packed tents, day and evening was the order of the day.

The C. O. D. man says that he is off for the great central marts of trade after a mammoth stock. When he gets back look out for a big announcement.

The Merchants, on Main Street is nicely fixed up and Johnny Strief claims that he can get up as fine mixtures as can be concocted out of liquid refreshments and invites the boys to drop in and sample.

Charlie Bond has so far recovered from his recent illness as to be able to be out on the streets a little. He had a tough time but a good constitution aided by Dr. Van Dyke pulled him through all right.

On the 14th inst. Esq. Cornelius hitched up John Solvest and Susie Harrison, of Fairfax, in double harness to run life's race as one. "Two selds with a sir-cingle thought; two beats that harp as one"—as the poet says.

Johnny Hack returned on Tuesday and was so glad that he had escaped being captured below and married by force that he got off the rear end of the train, crauled through the coal sheds and escaped insafety to the store via Sampson's Addition,

The Emerson boys met the Grand Forks club on the diamond field on Tuesday and got scooped. Tried 'em again on Wednesday with the same result. This is not the first time we've heard of Johnny Bull's running against a snag in America.

Charlie Douglass, he of the Emerson International, gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday. Charlie has been recently elected to represent his district in the Legislature at Winnipeg which proves that his constituents know a good man when they see him.

The Sherman House has a fine new register which went into use on Friday last. It looked so neat and nobby that we were sorely tempted to register our name for one of Capt. Janning's hoss dinners and the lack of the necessary fifty cents was all that saved Capt. that infliction.

Mr. Ira Kidder reached home on Monday morning, after an extended trip through Montana. He has enjoyed his trip very much and says that he never saw any fat cattle before he went out to Montana. He says that all the cattle there are hog fat on grass, no grain being ever fed. 'Tis no grain country out there being too dry.

Dr. M. Van Dyke was made the recipient of a handsome sign, neatly done in gold, the handiwork of Mr. John Date, who has been working for McCulough. John is going out to the Pacific coast and leaves this sign for doc as a proof of friendship. It is a nobby one and makes a valuable present.

By personal inspection, by careful inquiry and the testimony of good judges we are led to the conclusion that the damage by drouth will not be as great as was feared. We find that crops will be pretty fair where they were properly put in and we are of the opinion that they will be as good on an average as they were last year.

J. M. Palmer of Angus, is enjoying the hospitality of the Box Hotel. He reports the New Era Grader, owned and run by his town, as causing very considerable dissatisfaction. It has been run constantly since it was purchased early in the season and has thrown up a wonderful amount of earth from the ditches into the road; just now it is being run by horses which are put on to work out their owners taxes, and there is no thought of trouble or objection as all prefer to put their horses on the grader to working them to plows and scrapers to make roads. The dissatisfaction arrives from the fact that all can not have the machine worked in front of their farms at the same time, and many would be glad to furnish the teams without charge to the town provided they could have the grader to make roads in front of their own farms. J. M. Palmer is chairman of the town board and is posted.

Interviewing W. D. Bailey, one of our most practical farmers upon the crop prospects that gentleman expressed regret that newspapers should make such a blow about a probadle large yield while all the facts, he says, point surely the other way. He says there will not be a half crop harvested in the Red River Valley, and that we need not look to the drouth for the reason wholly, but that it was due in a large degree to lack of sufficient and proper culture. Why, sir, said he, you newspaper men ought to harp continually upon the benefits of summer fallowing, nor let up until every farmer becomes so thoroughly impressed with the advantages that he would leave about one-half his farm for summer fallowing while he put in extra work on the balance. He says that he has a piece of wheat on ground summer fallowed last year to kill wild mustard, and, while it did not kill the wild mustard worth a cent it is the best piece of wheat he ever raised and that it will go at least thirty bushels per acre. He fully believes in thorough cultivation and so do we.

John Wyand has purchased a fine farm team of Louis Fried. John says it is the boss team.

Henry Bender has returned and has a fine lot of horses for sale. Some trotters in the lot.

Master Harry H. White, son of T. S. White, of St. Paul, is on a visit to his aunt, Mrs. Chas. Mix, at St. Hilaire. The little fellow is only 14 years old and made the trip from St. Paul alone.

Geo. L. O'Neale, of Buxton, D. T., a former resident of this city dropped in on us this morning. He is much surprised to see the wonderful improvements that have been made in a year.

Mr. H. Brin intends to start for Chicago and New York the last of this week after a larger stock of fall and winter goods than he ever brought to this city. He will return about Sept. 25th.

Our scribe met Burt Jones, a Crookston old-timer, at St. Paul last week. Burt has had a good situation as mill wright but would awfully like to get back to Crookston to live. He sends his regards to all old friends.

Thor Haatvedt has returned from his farm in the withdrawn reservation. He is still undecided whether to go ahead with the farm, publish his book of poems or climb a tree. We would advise him to publish his book.

The Duluth News announces that it will soon enter the daily field. Bro. Woodbridge is publishing an excellent local weekly and seems to be making money at it. The sand that he displays in entering the daily field, already occupied by three good papers is remarkable even in a newspaper man. However we wish him abundant success.

We are under obligation to Charlie Seely for the "Wild Irishman," "Johnny Jum-pup" or whatever that sprawling thing in a dish is that hangs so gracefully suspended on a string forninst our office window. It is a daisy and is just the thing for a scribe, as its little tendrils go nosing about everywhere, evidently on the war-path for items of news. It is a fine bird and we propose to encourage it along until it blooms into a whole Zoological garden or a circus.

That little dog of John Leo's shows bright evidences of a rare intelligence in one so young. Having become identified with a lawyer's office he is seeking for legal light. He looked into the hat of the august State Senator, Steenersen, in quest of light but failed to discover much although he made a hole in the top six inches long or so. John thinks that sagacity so rare ought to be encouraged but he can't convince Steenerson that he is right about it. Steenerson says the "dod-gasted purp ought to be massacred."

The Editorial Convention held in the Capitol, at St. Paul, on Wednesday last was a success in point of members and interest. After the session adjourned for the excursion the numbers repaired to the dining hall at the Union depot where a big spread had been prepared by the Northwestern Newspaper Union, which was heartily enjoyed by the hungry newspaper men in a manner that would convince a skeptic that a printer knows a good thing when he sees it (on the table.) After a bounteous repast, the editors and their wives took a train on the St. P. M. & M. R. R., for the excursion to the Devil's Lake, Winnipeg and the Lake of the Woods. Arriving at Moorhead the company were entertained at the Grand Pacific hotel, partaking of a passable breakfast for which they paid the small sum of 75 cents each, then took the train and left for Grand Forks Junction at which point the excursionists' cars were attached to another engine and taken to Devil's Lake. At this point our scribe left for home but was informed upon the return of the party that they had a good time all 'round.

Notice of Dissolution.

SELFISHNESS UNPARALLED

An Extra[illegible]dinary Case of Overreaching Cupidity—A Designing Widow[illegible]nfiture.

[illegible] the Surrogate's office on a [illegible] morning might have heard the [illegible]versation, if he had happened in at the right time:

"Squire," said the man from [illegible] he strode into the Surrogate's office, wearing a fresh weed on his hat, but ill succeeding in the evident attempt to conceal a high degree of satisfaction under the external show of sorrow, which propriety seemed to demand.

"Good morning my dear sir," said the Surrogate, as he turned from a critical survey of the bootblack's study in blacking on the cloth tops of his boots. "You seem to be in affliction. Can I do anything for you?"

"Wall, yes, Squire, I have been visited by a dispensation o' Providence, so to speak, and p'r'aps you ken sorter 'lay my cur'osity about ap'int or two. Fact is, Squire, my wife Hannah died last night, an' I come into town fer a coffin. Hannah was a good savin' woman, an' she's goin' to hev a fust class funeral ef I know myself. 'N seein' 's I'm here, thinks I, I'll jist drop in 'n' see 't I've got ter go through any performange 'bout gettin' possession o' Hannah's prop'ty. S'pose it's all right jis' 's 't is, ain't it, Squire?"

"That depends, my dear fellow," said the Surrogate; "it makes all the difference in the world how your wife came by her property; what it consist of; how she disposed of it, or whom she left to inherit it."

"Do tell," said the man from G. as he rolled his quid from one cheek to the other, and heaved a sigh—presumably onf of respect to the late lamented. "Of course I know it's all mine, anyhow, 'n I can't for the life of me see what odds all them things kin make. But I don't mind tellin' just how 'tis, squire."

By this time the bystanders began to show indications of interest. Three lawyers who had dropped in to look for a possible fee arranged themselves in listening attitude; the raw reporter sharpened his pencil with Surrogate's penknife, that functionary the while keeping a sharp weather-eye on his property and the m. from G. continued:

"Oh, but, ye see, squire, the deacon willed all his property to the widder," and the chuckle which had been maturing broadened into something very like a grin.

"Indeed; no children, then, of course?"

"Wrong ag'in, squire; four on 'em, three gals an' a boy."

"Didn't the deacon make any provision for them?"

"Wall, I s'pose, betwixt you an' me, Squire, he did have an understan'in' with Hannah that she'd give the young 'uns a home, and leave them the property when she died."

"Ye see, 'Squire, my wife was Deacon Joshua Gordon's widder up in Washington county—"

"Ah," interrupted the Surrogate, "I've heerd of the Deacon. Left a handsome property, I've understood."

"Wall, yes, 'Squire, I guess I y'r safe in assumin' t' ther' was a perty conside'ble pile—$75,000 or thereabouts; quite an inducement to marry the widder, eh?"

And the m. from G. manifested a tendency to chuck the Surrogate in the ribs, a familiarity which that official might have resented at some period more remote from the next county election, but now contented himself with evading, as he remarked:

"Yes, I presume so, especially if the Deacon left no heirs, and—"

"Do the children live with you?"

"Me! Do you s'pose, 'Squire, I'm such a tarnation fool's to marry a hull fam'ly o' gals 'n' a good for nothin' boy into the bargain? No siree, boss, no kids for me, even o' my own, let alone other men's! I turned them out t' grass, lively, you bet y'r boots's soon's I come into possession!"

"I suppose, at least, their mother made provision for the children before her death?"

"Wall, no, 'Squire, to tell the truth, she did n't. She did talk one spell 'bout makin' a will 'n givin' the chil'n half 'n' me t'other half, but I kin o' talked her out on 't. I'm up to a thing or two, 'Squire; I aint agoin' to take no half loaf when I kin hev the hull on 't, ye know!"

"But how did you persuade your wife to leave her children penniless?"

"Oh! I reckon she'd somehow got a notion t' the law 'd allow them suthin' out o' their father's property anyhow, an' I didn't ondeceive her; hed n't the heart to, ye see."

Here another sigh escaped the manly bosom of the m. from G., while the Surrogate looked daggers, but proceeded:

"Was your marriage blessed with any off-spring?"

"Any kids, ye mean, 'Squire? Nary a one, thank ye."

"In what shape was the deacon's property?"

"Notes 'n mortgages and Guv'ment bonds, every red cent of it. But jist 's soon 's I got the management on it I says: "Hannah, I'm a goin' t' buy land with that 'ere money. Don't want no notes nor Guv'ments nor no sort o' perishable stuff t' show fer my money," says I. An' Hannah was jist that supple like she says: 'Just 's you think best 'bout that, Elkanah." An' don't you think 'Squire, that woman was so confiden' she wanted me take all them deeds in my own name!"

"And you did so?"

"No, 'Squire, I argu'd like this. I says to myself, 'What's my wife's is mine, except when my creditors get after it, an' then it's just as well not to own any real estate. I've got a long head, 'Squire, and don't you forget it. And when I owe five hundred dollars 't I ain't in no hurry to pay I don't want t' own two much 't's in sight, you bet!' But come, 'Squire, I do n't 'spose nothin's got to be done, has there? I'm fixed all right, ain't I? Not that I've any doubt on't but I thought seein' I's in I'd jest get your jedgment on't, seein' 't don't cost nothin', while I'm waitin' for the coffin. I told 'em to take their time 'n durn the 'xpense, Want ye 't understand there's nothin' mean about me, 'Squire."

And the concluding sigh was a dead failure. The m. from G. could see the acres bought with the deacon's dollars already his.

The Surrogate looked him over for fully two minutes before he replied, and the lawyers and the raw reporter, seeing the expression on his face, braced themselves for the opinion that followed, per curiam.

"Yes, old man, you're fixed, no mistake. And you won't need to trouble yourself one bit about the Deacon's estate. You're just about the smartest cove I've seen yet. Now, you might have been so short sighted as to keep the Deacon's money just as he left it, personal property, and so have been entitled to only one-third of it upon your wife's death; but you were much to keen for that! Or you might have been so foolish as to allow the deeds to be made out in your own name; and then how your creditors would have gloated over their $500! But you were too old a fox to be caught in such a flusy trap, though, to be sure, what the creditors left would have been yours. Or if you had permitted your wife to make the will as she proposed, how one-half the Deacon's board would have slipped out of your hands! But you have planned better. I assure you there isn't a lawyer in the county who could have advised you so clearly. Let me congratulate you on the success your efforts deserve!"

"And that is—?" asked the m. from G., too eager now for even a pretense at sorrow.

"Just this. You have tried your worst to cheat the Deacon's children out of their father's estate, and through your monumental stupidity have succeeded in depriving yourself of every possible hold, and in having the property left in such shape that the children will have every dollar that belongs to them; while you get your deserts. No, sir; not a solitary red cent do you get, unless the Deacon's children help you to it, and under the circumstances I don't believe even you will have the cheek to ask them."

As the man from Grafton turned to go, vowing vengeance on all that remained of the Deacon's widow in muttered threats of a pine coffin and no minister at the funeral, the Surrogate fired his parting shot:

"Now, look-a-here, old man, don't do it! The law allows your wife a decent burial, and I propose to be on hand and see that she has it. Govern yourself accordingly!"—Troy Times.

OCCASIONS FOR PRAYER.

Two Episodes in the Life of Rev. Lyman Beecher.

There is one anecdote told by Mrs. Spillman about the Rev. Lyman Beecher, the father of Henry Ward, which may have been published, but I have never seen it. Mr. Beecher had been called to Boston to preach. He was a widower at the time and thought it would be a good idea to combine pleasure with business and look for a wife while there. But it seems that the search was unsatisfactory and the old gentleman was about to give it up. He had announced to his congregation that he was going back to Cincinnati, and upon that occasion he would deliver his farewell sermon, which he did. The next day he met a friend who asked him why he was going to leave so soon, and Mr. Beecher unbosomed himself and told him of his disappointment. "Oh!" said the friend, "that could be easily remedied; he knew just the lady. There was the widow Bems, she was just the woman, and would suit Mr. Beecher exactly." So Mr. Beecher decided to remain and make the last great effort of his life. The next day he called upon her. He introduced himself, and abruptly popped the momentous question with which his mind was over-burdened. It considerably startled the good lady, and she remonstrated with the good man thus:

"Brother Beecher, really I—I was not prepared to—."

"Preparation is not necessary," said Brother Beecher.

"But I have no time to reflect," argued Mrs. Bems.

"Don't reflect," persisted Mr. Beecher.

"But in so important a matter on should go to the great judge at the throne of grace and ask to be guided. One should have time for prayer," said Mrs. Bems.

"Let us pray now," said Brother Beecher, and down on his knees he went, the widow following suit, and he poured forth an eloquent-horse-power-pressure argument in his own favor. When they arose at the conclusion, Mrs. Bems admitted that all objection was removed and accepted the inevitable.

An amusing incident happened shortly after they were married, although Mr. Beecher did not seem to catch the point of the joke. While riding their horse took fright, and becoming unmanageable, overturned the vehicle, emptying its contents on the dusty thoroughfare. Mr. Beecher escaped with no injury, but a pretty bad scare. After picking up the pieces and finding that they still lived, Mrs. Beecher remarked that it would be quite appropriate to offer up thanks for their miraculous escape, to which Mr. Beecher remarked: "Offer up thanks for yourself; as for me, I'm pretty badly broken up."

Emerson and England.

At the end of an article on Emerson's "English Traits" the Pall Mall Gazette remarks;

"We wonder how much of this description would pass for true now? Are all Englishmen John Bulls—beefy, mutton-fisted wielders of the sledge-hammer of common sense—deaf to the more ideal aspect of things, and yet extorting respect, and even blundering into works of genius, by their indomitable vigor? Are we so hidebound in prejudices—such examples of 'arrested development?' Mr. Matthew Arnold would perhaps agree with Emerson in the main. England, he says, is a blind Titan; as Emerson calls her, a "divine cripple like India." That is for others to say; at least, it is not to be said at the end of a brief review. But we cannot help reflecting, after all, how rash and unsatisfactory are all sweeping judgments upon national peculiarities, and how many qualifications we should have to suggest before we could accept Emerson's theory as accurate. Doubtless, it represents the way in which England strikes the mind already prepared with a certain theory; but, though it is pleasant reading, we are struck at every point with doubts as to the real resemblance."

Five Thousand Dollars a Pound.

In his last letter to the Atlanta Constitution "Bill Arp" says:

As a general thing the girls show too much anxiety to marry. They are too sweet on the boys. They ought to stand off and look reserved and precious and put on Jerusalem airs and say young man you don't know who you are fooling with. I'm a treasure, I am. I weigh 115 pounds and am worth $1,000 a pound. Well, they are. A good, nice, healthy girl who can make her own dress and set up a good supper for company and is not ashamed to wait on the table while they are eating, is just worth about $1,000 a pound. But that is nothing compared with what they will be worth. Why, Mrs. Arp has cut out and made up at least 2,000 garments of one sort and another. She has sewed 500,000 stitches, and patched and darned and washed faces and feet and combed hair innumerable. She has tied up 500 sore toes and cut fingers and burns and bruises and kissed away a thousand tears. She has watched em by night and by day, and keeps on watching; and right now, while I am writing on my piazza, she is looking way up the big road, and says: "I'm afraid something will happen to them boys; they are too little to go on by themselves." There are two little nephews here just out of school, and they and Carle have all got a horse or a colt apiece, and have gone off on a "scursion," and I call them the infantry cavalry and tell Mrs. Arp it is all right, but she sits here sewing with her specks on and ever and anon looks up the road and says, "Those children have overstayed their time. I'm afraid something has happened." If they don't come back soon I know that I will have to start after 'em, for this is always the way." Mrs. Arp is worth at least $5,000 a pound, and she weighs right smart and keeps a getting heavier. I am rich, I am. I feel wealthy whenever I look at her.

THE IRON ROOM.

From the Argosy.

Directly the large country house began to lose its guests, the hostess, Mrs. Hope, had time to look about her, and one of the first inconvenient things she saw was the very evident love affair between handsome Jack Talbot, of the —th, who had nothing in the world but his Captain's pay, and her only daughter Lillian, who first duty to her parents lay in making an eligible match! This would never do. But the worldly wise lady reflected that Captain Talbot's visit was only to last three days longer, and with true art appeared blissfully content with the position. The night before he went away, the suitor applied to Mr. Hope, and begged to have his prayer favorably answered; and he (having received his brief from his wife) temporized gently; spoke of youth, changeable affections, and so on, and said he could not at present give a definite answer.

"May I hope?" asked the suitor.

"If you like," said the father; and nothing could have ended better. Lillian waved a damp pocket-handkerchief from the window, and the knight "rode away."

A month later Jack was ordered to Egypt, and Mrs. Hope thought it highly probable that all her difficulties would be removed by the Egyptians. If not, the time was gained at any rate, and Lillian was growing handsomer every day.

"My dear," said Mr. Hope one evening, "Lord Blackmoor is evidently struck with Lillian."

"So I see," responded the wife, smiling complacently.

"I shouldn't be surpised if he spoke shortly."

"So much the better."

"But ah—haw about that other fellow?" queried Mr. Hope, uneasily.

"Nothing about him," said Mrs. Hope, resolutely; "he must not be mentioned."

"Lork Blackmoor is very old."

"He will make the better husband."

"Lillian is a beautiful, warm-hearted girl!" faltered the father.

"Had she not been beautiful a coronet would not have been offered her."

"But Harriet, you and I were both young when we were married."

Mrs. Hope calmly fixed her fine eyes on the ceiling, and her husband saw sentiment would find no response.

And so, while Jack was bronzing his handsome face and fighting for his country in Egypt, his Lillian was desired to receive the addresses of an elaborate old fop of seventy-five, and she only eighteen. But these things happened, so we must contemplate them.

Between her mother and Lord Blackmoor it was arranged that the wedding should take place in December, and in the meantime rumor came that captain Talbot was killed.

The Hopes return took place the end of November, and the old bridegroom elect was to come there in December. He arrived, and, to the girl seemed more distasteful than ever. He followed her about with an affection of youthful ardor, which sorely warred with gout and dyspepsia.

"Mamma," said the frenzied Lillian, "if you don't keep him away from me now, I'll say no at the altar!" And fearing that this was true, Mrs. Hope rejoiced in an attack of gout which confined the old nobleman to his room, where she treated him with flattery and devotion.

So then the poor girl wandered down to the boat house. It was half a mile from the house, and there was a snugly furnished iron room there, where tea things and spirit lamps were kept. Lillian had often made tea here in the happy summer; and now she entered the room, which stauck cold and damp from long disuse, and throwing herself in a chair, and sobbed as if her heart were breaking.

A footstep outside made Lillian start up quickly. It was the postman on his way to the house.

"Have you any letters for me?" asked the girl.

"Yes, miss, surely," said the man; and he found three, handed them to her, and passed on.

Lillian re-entered the iron-room, sank on a sofa, and with trembling hands tore open one—it was from Jack. As she read it she found that other letters had been sent to her—who had them? Jack was in London; said he was fast recovering from his wounds, and that he had determined to come down and hear from her own lips that she gave him up. And concluded by saying he would be at the boat-house by 5 o'clock the next evening—would she meet him there?

The next evening meant this evening; this evening that ever was; for the letter had been written the day before.

Lillian's delight at this unexpected news was paramdunt. She hastened back to the house, determining that nothing should reveal the change. She inquired civilly after Lord Blackmoor, had five dresses tried on by a dressmaker, drove wrth her mother to pay some calls and when they returned home it was a quarter to five o'clock. Mrs. Hope ordered tea for herself in her bedroom saying she should sit afterward with Lord Blackmoor till dinner time, so Lillian was at liberty. She escaped in the dark winter afternoon, ran swiftly through the park, and as she neared the boathouse she saw a tall, well-known figure keeping out of the way of observation. Her heart beat so violently that she could scarcely go on, and then the lover threw caution to the winds, and in another few seconds all that was needful was told, and the old, old story went on as smoothly as if no old Lord Blackmoor existed.

Late that night, after Mrs. Hope and the servants had gone to bed, Lillian sought her father in the library.

"My dear girl, what is the matter?" he cried, nervously, as the fair form of his daughter, robed in a light blue dressing gown, suddenly appeared and sat down on his foot-stool.

"Papa, Jack isn't dead," whispered Lillian, fixing her lovely eyes on Mr. Hope's wondering countenance and fondling his hand.

"Isn't he, my dear?" helplessly inquired the old gentleman, who had been aware of the fact for some time.

"I am going to marry Jack, papa—"

"Then don't tell me, my dear, don't tell me!" exclaimed Mr. Hope, a beam of delight on his countenance. "I know nothing about it, mind; if I did your mother would worm it out of me." For there are still "Caudle Lectures," dear reader.

"Then, dear, dear papa—you won't be angry—if—to-morrow—"

"Never, my love, never, as long as I know nothing about it," hastily cried the father, kissing the pretty upturned face, and adding in a whisper, "Talbot is the soul of honor, and I can trust him."

In the gray morning it was Miss Hope's habit to take a walk. She took one the next morning, and a muffled figure emerged from the iron room to meet her. And by the first up-train these two reached London, and by the time Lord Backmoor's gout relented sufficiently to enable him to appear at a late breakfast, where he hoped to meet his fair fiance, a telegram from John Tablot, announced to the scandalized father and the mortified nobleman that Lillian would never wear a coronet.

She did not do badly, though. An eccentric godmother of Captain Tablot's was so impressed by the fact that a girl had refused a coronet for his sake that she left him her fortune.

A QUEEN OF THE STAGE.

"Her Second Love," and the Important Secret She Reveals for the Benefit of Women.

New York World.

Several years ago the American public were aroused by the entree upon the stage of a little lady who had been previously but little announced. She was one of an innumerable number of aspirants for public favor and had no instrumentality, aside from her own talents to cause recognition. In spite of this fact, however, she quickly achieved a warm place in the heart of the public which she has continued to hold ever since. When it was announced, therefore, that Miss Maude Granger would star the coming season in the play "Her Second Love," written by Mr. John A. Stevens, it was only natural that unusual interest should be manifested not only in theatrical circles, but in other branches of the community. This was specially the case, as it was known that Miss Granger had, for the past year, been in exceedingly delicate health, and the determination to star in a strong emotional play was the more surprising. One of the staff of this paper was accordingly deputized to see the popular lady and verify the rumor or announce its incorrectness.

Miss Granger's countenance is familiar to nearly every one in the United States. It is a face once seen never to be forgotten. Features remarkable in their outline and contour are surmounted by a pair of large and deep eyes indicative of the greatest soul power. It is easy to see where Miss Granger obtains the ability to portray characters of the most emotional nature. She possesses within herself the elements of feeling without which no emotion can be conveyed to an audience. The man of news found the lady at her home in this city and was accorded a quiet welcome. It was evident at once that she was in greatly improved health, which the expression and color of her countenance both indicated.

"Is it true Miss Granger that you contemplate a starring tour the coming season?"

"Yes, indeed. My season begins in Chicago on the 16th of July. From there I go to San Francisco and then play the remainder of the season through the eastern and western states."

"Are you confident your health will permit such an undertaking?"

A ringing laugh was the first reply to this question, after which she said:

"Certainly. It is true I have been ill for the past two years, but now I am wholly recovered. Few people can have any idea of the strain a conscientious actress undergoes in essaying an emotional part. It is necessary to put one's whole soul into the work in order to rightly portray the character. This necessitates an utter abandonment of one's personality and an assumption of the character portrayed. If this is an emotional part it is necessary to feel the same emotions the part it is supposed to feel. For more than a year I actually cried each night in certain passages of a part I was playing. The audience considered it art. Probably it was, but those were none the less real tears and the effect none the less trying upon my health."

"But do you anticipate avoiding this in the future?"

"Not in the least. I expect to have just as great a strain as before but with restored health and a knowledge of how to retain it I do not fear."

"You speak of a 'knowledge of how to retain health.' Will you please explain what you mean by that?"

"You must be aware that women by their very natures are subject to troubles and afflictions unknown to the sterner sex. The name of these troubles is legion, but in whatever form they may come they are weaknesses which interfere with every ambition and hope in life. I believe thousands of noble women are to-day suffering agonies of which even their best friends and relatives know little or nothing, and when I reflect upon it I confess it makes me sad. Now all this misery arises largely from an ignorance of the laws of life or a neglect to carefully observe them. I speak from the depths of a bitter experience in saying this, and I am thankful I know the means of restoration, and how to remain in perfect health."

"Please explain more fully."

"Well, I have found a remedy which seems specially adapted for this very purpose. It is pure and palatable and controls the health and life as, I believe, nothing else will. It is really invaluable and if all the women in America were to use it I am quite sure most of the sufferings and many deaths might be avoided."

"What is this wonderful remedy?"

"Warner's Safe Cure."

"And you use it?"

"Constantly."

"And hence believe you will be able to go through the coming season successfully?"

"I am quite certain of it."

"A few questions more, Miss Granger. Will you please give me a list of the parts you have created and the plays you have taken part in since your first appearance in public?"

"I first played for some time with the amateurs in New York and Brooklyn. I then went to the Union Square theatre for two seasons, after that to the Boston Globe for one season and then to Booth's theatre in this city. Next I supported John McCullough and afterwards starred in Juliet, Camille Rosalind, etc. Subsequently I created the part of Cicely Blaine in the Galley Slave and also starred in Two Nights in Rome, playing the part of Antonia. The past year I have been playing in the Planter's Wife and the coming season, as I have said, will be devoted to Her Second Love."

As the writer was returning home he fell into a train of musing and wondered if all the women in this land who are suffering could only know Miss Granger's experience and the remarkable results achieved by the pure remedy she used, how much suffering might be avoided and how much happiness secured.

A Millionaire's Choice of a Wife.

Norwich Dispatch to the New York Sun.—Fifteen years ago Captain George W. Rogers, of this city, who had been a captain on a southern line of steamers, died, leaving his family, a widow and a son and daughter, in moderate circumstances. They had a pleasant home, on Hill street, and by means of economy managed to live comfortably. Several years ago the daughter, Miss Georgette T. a beautiful and spirited young lady decided to support herself. She became a professional nurse in a Providence hospital. Subsequently she went to a hospital in Hartford, and while there was engaged to Mr Christopher M. Spencer, the millionaire inventor and manufacturer of the Spencer rifle, to attend his wife, who was dying of consumption. Miss Rogers was the attendant of Mrs. Spencer until that lady's death, last September. The patient care and gentle disposition shown by the young nurse at the sick bed won the regard of Mr. Spencer and he recently asked her to be his wife. Their marriage was celebrated in the Central Baptist church, in this city, at noon yesterday, the pastor, the Rev. Dr. Herr, performing the ceremony in the presence of a large assemly. The bride is twenty-five and the bridegroom about fifty years of age. They sail for Europe this week.

From the Dude's Own Standpoint.

We had all been admiring the dude in "my" hotel, writes a Saratoga correspondent of the New York Times. We had only one, and were not only proud of it, but felt a sort of ownership in it. But now we have another, and his first appearance in the dining room was the occasion of a very funny scene. The first dude was eating his dinner when the second came in. The second was a good deal duder dude than the first, His trousers were several points tighter; his collar was wider was fitted closer to his throat. His coat was so intensely English that if he had tried to put his arms down flat to his sides he would have burst the seams. But he didn't make any such effort; his aspirations were all in the opposite direction. His hair was combed down over his forehead and beautifully parted in the middle. He had rather a pretty white face, and would have made a very sweet girl—a position in life for which nature evidently designed him. Of course, everybody stared at him. The waiters looked at each other slyly out of the corners of their eyes, though they did not dare to smile. The head waiter took the new arrival up past the middle of the big dining room, so that everybody had a good view of him. As he passed the first dude, that fallen star looked up at him, and gave him a grand looking over from head to foot. Then he turned to his party and began to laugh. It is to be excepted, of course, that ordinary people will laugh at a dude. But this spectacle of one dude laughing at the ridiculous appearance of another dude was enjoyed by everybody who noticed it. There are very few of them here—not more than three or four real ones in the place—and whenever a new one arrives the word goes around the hotel piazzas, among the ladies, "There's another dude in town; have you seen it?"

Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Cramps, Cholera, Diarrhoea, Dysentery.

Sprains and Bruises, Burns and Scalds, Toothache and Headache

For Sale by all Druggists.

TUTT'S EXPECTORANT

Is composed of Herbal and Mucilaginous products, which permeate the substance of the Lungs, expectorates the acrid matter that collects in the Bronchial Tubes, and forms a soothing coating, which relieves the irritation that causes the cough. It cleanses the lungs of all impurities, strengthens them when enfeebled by disease, invigorates the circulation of the blood, and braces the nervous system. Slight colds often end in consumption. It is dangerous to neglect them. Apply the remedy promptly. A test of twenty years warrants the assertion that no remedy has ever been found that is as prompt in its effects as TUTT'S EXPECTORANT. A single dose raises the phlegm, subdues inflammation, and its use speedily cures the most obstinate cough. A pleasant cordial, children take it readily. For Croup it is invaluable and should be in every family. In 25c. and $1 Bottles.

TUTT'S PILLS

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS

[illegible]

A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

[From the Boston Globe.]

Messrs. Editors:— The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure entirely the worst form of falling of the uterus, Leucorrhœa, irregular and painful Menstruation, all Ovarian Troubles, Inflammation and Ulceration, Floodings, all Displacements and the consequent spinal weakness, and is especially adapted to the Change of Life."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as abundant testimonials show.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity.

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

It is the common practice of the gold and silver refiners of England, France and Switzerland to purchase from the pawnbrokers of their respective countries all gold and silver watches which have been unredeemed, simply for the value of the gold and silver cases. The works are sold to a celebrated watch firm, and skillful workmen put them in good condition as possible. These works embrace every variety of movement, some of them being very fine and perfect time-keepers, others not quite so good, but, take the watches as they average, they are certainly the best value for the money ever offered. The cases are strong white metal. You are sure to get your money's worth, and in most cases a great deal more than the trifling cost, and often a splendid time-keeper. We have put the prices right down to the lowest point, viz: We will send ONE watch by express for TWO DOLLARS; THREE watches by express for FIVE DOLLARS. SPECIAL We will send one watch by registered mail, postage paid, for $2.25; three watches by registered mail for $5.85. For Fifty Cents extra, we will send our new and ELEGANT WATCH CHAIN, with a WHISTLE CHARM and DOG CALL ATTACHMENT just the thing for Hunters and Sporting Men. What our Customers say.—"I received the $2.00 watch and sold one for $10. Could have sold a dozen if I had them. Send price per dozen.—H. T. McCALLON, Ferris, Texas." "I received $2.00 watch in good order, keeps splendid time. I have been offered $4 for it. Give me best figures by the half dozen.—WM. L. FISHER, Middleport, W. Va." "The two watches I purchased from you last fall give good satisfaction. I never had a better time-keeper than your $2 watch.—CHAS. PROCTOR, Corunna, Ontario, Canada." BLOOD AND THUNDER.

Stunning Texas Yarns—Old Reese A Friend of the Bandits and a Man Always Ready to Shoot—His Trouble With A Gambler—A Little Bill That Was Squared—A Very Bad Man's Story.

Texas Correspondence of the Phil., Times.

"I met "Old Reese" here for the first in 1874 and renewed the acquaintance yesterday. I thought him dead long ago. He is the typical Texas bad man and his record as a slayer of his fellow-men extends over a period of twenty-five years. Only once has he been in prison for these killings, but then only for a few months. Although his enemies are legion he has also many powerful friends, and they stand by him whenever he gets into a difficulty. His history for the last quarter of a century if written out would fill several good-sized volumes and be more interesting in a blood-and-thunder sense than the average dime novel.

"Old Reese" was born in Kentucky and is now a man of fifty-five or thereabouts. He was one of Quantrell's men during the late unpleasantness and rode with that doughty guerilla until the bitter end. He knew Frank and Jesse James; kept up his friendship for the latter until his death and is still Frank's big man. I am afraid those two chaps of doubtful heroism—the Ford boys—would meet with rough treatment if they should ever cross the path of "Old Reese." When I first met "Old Reese" Texas was full of bad men. They were divided into three classes. There was the fugitive from justice, whom necessity ruled; the outlawed robber, ruled by circumstances, and the rustler, who knew no rule, but killed men simply to "see them kick." John Wesley Hardin, now in the penitentiary, and the subject of this sketch were men of the latter class. Sam Bass and his lieutenant, "Arkansaw Johnson," were fair representatives of the middle class. The first mentioned produce no distinguished example. They were the larger class and killed men only to save their own lives. Sam Bass never took human life unless it was absolutely necessary. "Old Reese" is one of the shoot-at-the-top-of-the-hat-and-drop-the-hat-himself-sort of men.

The first time I met him the following incident occurred: I was in a casino here, kept at that time by a discharged soldier named Nunnelly. A baile of Mexican ball, was in full blast, all the games were running and business at the bar was flourishing. Suddenly a hush fell upon the room, the dance stopped, the gamblers ceased playing and the freshly-ordered drinks remained untouched. I looked around to learn the cause of this unusual quiet and saw "Old Reese" standing in the doorway. I had never met him before, but I at once recognized him from descriptions given me by his admirers. He did not look the desperado. His eyes were blue, large and sensuous. He had a dimpled chin and his mouth, although firm and resolute, was guarded by full, red lips, and the under one drooped, which is, accordinr to physiognomists, a sure indication of weakness in a woman and effeminacy in a man. Contrary to the usual fashion on the frontier his hair was cut close and it absolutely curled. He was dressed very quietly in sober black, and aside from the rakish sombrero which shrouded his face might have passed for an indolent divinity student, with mere soul for things carnal than spiritual. He stood in the doorway for a minute and then advanced into the centre of the room. His blue eyes roamed around the apartment and finally rested on a long-haired fellow sitting at one of the monte tables. They burned now with a new fire and a cruel line closed about his mouth. The long-haired fellow shifted about uncomfortably, but did not offer to draw one of the numerous six-shooters which bristled in his belt. Finally "Old Reese" spoke, enunciating his words slowly and with great distinctness.

"Sam Sturgis," he said, and the long-haired fellow started, "if I thought you were half the man you claim to be I would kill you where you sit." He paused a moment and then continued: "When I kill a man I want him to be a good one. You are a dirty thief and contemplible coward to sit there and take it."

There was nothing of the bully in this declaration, or rather there was no bravado in his way of making it. One could see that he meant what he said and the long-haired fellow seemed to be so convinced, for he never raised his eyes and his hands hung listless by his side. He rested uncomfortably under the steady blaze of "Old Reese's" eyes, however, and finally raised his head. Old Reese pointed to the door.

"Git!" he said. "And if you don't want me to forget myself and kill a coward never get in my way."

The long-haired fellow rose to his feet and slunk away. His master's eye followed him to the door and when it closed behind him he walked to the bar and invited everybody up to drink. All responded, for it was well known that old Reese considered it a mortal insult to refuse his hospitality and would be pretty apt to shoot the man who was reckless enough to decline his invitation. I noticed that he drank only water himself, and the friend who introduced us afterwards told me that old Reese was strictly temperate.

"He has no small vices," said his admirer. "He neither drinks, chews, smokes nor curses; but if you think he ain't old h—l on the shoot just try him once."

I had a long conversation with him that night, and the more I saw of him the better I liked him. He had a charming manner, was a good conversationalist, had read some, observed more, and never "talked shop," that is he spoke about himself and his many daring deeds with a great deal of diffidence and modesty. His friend gave me the history of his trouble with the long-haired fellow.

"Sturgis is a gambler," he said, "and when he first came here everybody was afraid of him, and he sorter run the settlement. Old Reese was away then. He came back here about two months ago. The day he returned he was passing along the street, when he met a little boy crying. Old Reese is very fond of children and they all like him. He picked the little fellow up, dried his tears and inquired the cause of his trouble. Between his sobs the boy told his story. He was the only son of a poor widow woman who lives down by the river and does washing for the gamblers. Early in the spring Sam Sturgis had employed him to attend to his horse, promising to pay him two dollars a week for his services. Glad to be able to help his mother, the little fellow took charge of the gambler's caballo and groomed and fed him for sixteen weeks. Then Sturgis sold the animal and his services were no longer required. He had just been in to ask Sturgis for his pay and the gambler had not only not paid him, but had pitched him out of the casino.

"He kicked you, did he?" said Reese, and those blue eyes of his snapped.

"Yes, sir," faltered the boy.

"And he wont pay you your money?"

"No, sir," whimpered the boy; "and mother needs it."

"I think he'll pay," answered Reese. "You run right home, now, and I'll be down to see you presently and bring the money."

Sturgis was pretty flush then and was running a big game. Old Reese went down to see him. Well, sir, its only about a week ago that he recovered from that interview and was able to be about."

Old Reese walked into the saloon, called for a pen and paper and made out the following bill:

LAREDO, TEXAS, Aug. 4, 1874.
SAM STURGIS,
To THE WIDOW WHITE'S KID, Dr.
To herding pony, 16 weeks, at $2 per week.....$32.00
To kicking said Kid when he asked for his money.....50,00
To cost of collection.....50.00
$132.00
Rec'd payment.

He walked up to the table where Sturgis was dealing monte and laid this bill before him.

"Sturgis," he said, "pay this little bill and I'll receipt it."

The gambler glanced at the paper, jumped to his feet, jerked out his six-shooter, and said, "I'll be d—d if do!"

"I think you will," cried Reese, and he knocked the fellow down.

Before he could regain his feet old Reese was upon him. He jerked the six-shooter out of Sturgis' hand and beat him over the head with it until he cried for mercy.

"Will you pay the bill?" asked Reese, raising the six-shooter to hit him again.

"Yes." And he paid it.

But Reese was not through with him yet. There was a justice of the peace in Laredo at the time, a recent institution. Old Reese knew that the gambler would have him arrested for the assault and compel him to pay a fine. He told two men to come forward as witnesses and in their presence made Sturgis swear that he (Reese) had never struck him.

"I was in the 'squires office that morning," continued my informant, "and knew nothing about the matter until Reese walked in. The 'squire didn't know him and I introduced them."

"Squire," said Reese, after the formalities were gone through with, "how much do you fine a man for assaulting another?"

"Well, that depends," said the Justice.

"Suppose you beat a man's head into jelly with your six shooter, for instance?"

"Well, that's a serious case, and I should be compelled to impose a heavy fine."

"But," continued Reese, "suppose I can call two witnesses to prove that the dirty coward swore in their presence that I never struck him, what then?"

The 'Squire laughed and Reese told the story. Of course there was nothing done about it, for public opinion which on the frontier has great influence on the decisions of justice, was overwhelmingly with Reese.

Old Reese is a very polite man and especially courteous to ladies. So was John Wesley Hardin. A friend of mine, now living at the capital of the state, is sometimes spoken of as the boss bad man of Texas. He is one of the most cordial and entertaining fellows I ever met and has thousands of devoted friends. He has been in several unfortunate difficulties, but they were none of them of his seeking; he has killed several men, but always in self-defense and after the other party had fired the first shot. Recently he killed a notorious character at San Antonio. The man was a bully and had threatened my friend's life repeatedly. He was the proprietor of a low vaudeville and was shot down in the doorway of his dive. A jury of twelve leading citizens pronounced the killing justifiable. Then the late prisoner returned to Austin he was met at the depot by a large concourse of citizens, headed by a brass band. They took the horses out of the carriage in waiting for him and dragged it through the streets as a testimony of their admiration for the occupant. I have been in company with this man many times and I never knew him to offer insult or affront, and many times he has allowed insults to himself to pass by unnoticed rather than provoke a quarrel. Not all of the bad men are of this character. Some are great boasters and continually parade their bloody deeds. I met a fellow once who had killed twenty-seven men. I was in his company less than one hour. During that time he boasted of the number of his victims no less than twenty times. Yet he was a brave man, and on more than one occasion had taken desperate risks. He was shortly afterwards hung by a vigilance committee. When the rope was placed about his neck all his valor seemed to leave him. He begged piteously for mercy and continued crying for his life until the tightening of the rope shut off his wind. I once witnessed the legal execution of a most brutal and cowardly monster. He ascended the gallows with a firm step, bowed nonchalantly to the crowd in front of the platform, called several acquaintances by name, bade everbody good-bye in a firm voice and gave the signal for the trap to fall.

Several years ago I met one of the most desperate men the west ever produced. It was in a post trader's saloon. The bad man's sometimes rival, now his friend and henchman, was of the party. I admired a magnificent breast-pin which the bad man wore. The design was a spar, and it was heavily set with diamonds of the finest water.

"Yes," said the bad man, "it's a fine pin. Jim," meaning the lesser bad man, "gave it to me. Do you know what for?"

I replied in the negative.

"Well," said he, "Jim's a bad man—one of the worst you ever saw—and he gave me this pin because I am a worse man than he is."

The first time I saw "Colorado Charlie," "Wild Bill's" old partner was in a casino at El Paso. A drunken admirer of his called my attention to him. He was dressed in a suit of black broadcloth and his curly, yellow hair fell far down on his shoulders.

"D'ye see that feller?" said the drunken man, pointing toward Charlie, who was at the bar drinking with a friend.

"Oh, yer," I said, "I see him."

"Notice his long ha'r?"

"Yes."

"An' that big hat?"

"Yes."

"Know what they mean?"

"Can't say that I do."

"Wall! That big hat means 'cheat ye at kyads' an' that long ha'r means 'shoot ye ef ye kick!'"

When "Wild Bill," whose real name was Hickok, was killed at Deadwood, "Colorado Charlie" took charge of the body and erected a splendid monument over the grave of his deceased friend. The inscription reads:

Here lies J. B. Hickok, "Wild Bill." Good-bye, old pard. We shall meet in the happy hunting-grounds. Erected by "Colorado Charlie" (C. U. Utter).

The Sun's Heat.

In a recent lecture on Solar Physics, at the Royal Institution, Sir William Siemens gives his reasons for setting the temperature of the photosphere of the sun at about 2,800 degrees, where C., instead of about 10,000 degrees, where Rosetti and other late investigators put it. He agrees, in this lower estimate, with Violle, St. Clair, Deville (?), and Sir William Thompson, and thinks the solar temperature cannot much, if at all, exceed that of the most powerful electric arcs. He recognizes only the fact that a temperature higher than 3,000 degrees C. would be absolutely conclusive against his theory that the solar heat is due to the recombination or burning of compound gases at the surface of the sun. He bases his estimate of the solar temperature upon three foundations: First, the behavior of a carbon rod and a small gas flame in the focus of a reflector exposed to the sun; second, on a comparison between the spectra of various lights, for instance, the Argand burner, an incandescent lamp, the electric arc, and the sun itself, as observed by Langley on Mt. Whitney; third, upon experiments on the relation between temperature and radiating power, made by means of a long platinum wire heated by an electric current.—New York Independent.

MRS. GARFIELD AT HOME.

Her Quiet Life and Improved Appearance—Molly and the Boys.

From the New York Sun.

Mrs. Garfield has made her home in Cleveland, and selected her surroundings in so quiet and careful a manner that comparatively few of the late president's more intimate associates, have any knowledge of her plans and of her daily life. Her house is a plain, brick structure, situated on a small lot in Prospect street. She paid $50,000 for it, and regards it more in the light of an investment than as a permanent home for herself and children. The affections of the Garfield family are evidently centered in the cottage at Mentor, and there is an impression that their residence at any other place will be temporary. The occupants of the city home at present are Mrs. Garfield, the late president's mother: Mrs. Larabie, his sister, who is in failing health; Miss Molly Garfield, and the younger boys, Irwin and Abram. The solemn-looking footman who ushers the visitor into the drawing room is the only ceremonious person to be found in the house. In consequence of Mrs. Garfield's withdrawal from all society the family usually dine alone. Grandmother Garfield seldom sits a dinner through, and when the desert is served she takes whatever she fancies in her hands and adjourns to the library. She is the one occupant of the house who is always visible. With her white hair and white cap, she can be seen at the window, in a little wicker rocking-chair, busied with her knitting or the daily papers.

Miss Molly is now a charming girl of 16, and to her has fallen a greater share of physical beauty than to any other member of the family. She is pursuing her studies at a private school, and has few acquaintances outside of her school associates. She is a bright scholar, and her mind is but little given to society matters. Irwin is like the Rudolphs, his mother's family. His mind is keen, and he possesses a shrewd mother wit. For a long time it was thought that the children were ignorant of the fact that they were the subjects of public comment, but one day, after Irwin had been corrected by his mother, he astonished her by repeating word for word, an extract from an eastern paper in which he was made to appear the very model of juvenile excellence.

Irwin and Abram, the youngest boy, together, form what might be called a team. They are regular young athletes, and are the prime movers in the boyish sports of the neighborhood. Harry and James are in the transition state—neither men nor boys. Harry is somewhat romantic, being fond of painting, poetry, vocal and instrumental music. He draws very cleverly, has a pleasant tenor voice, and is unusually skillful at the piano for one of his age. While he is a creditable student, his mind is given up to such a variety of subjects that he does not perfect himself in any one of them. James is in all respects Harry's opposite. He leads in his classes, and is much given to outdoor games.

Mrs. Garfield herself is a changed woman, and one who saw her two years ago, burdened with the responsibilities of a life she never cared for, would scarcely recognize her so much has she improved. The deep lines that once marked her face are gone, and in their stead is an expression that belongs only to one who is well content with the world. She manages her affairs seemingly forgetfull of the past and unmindful of the future, and yet to one knowing her it is apparent that she has a regard for both. When asked by a visitor who was paying her a visit of condolence if she was not comforted by the fact that the entire world mourned with her, she replied: "Yes, when I think about it."

To her friends Mrs. Garfield seldom speaks of her late husband as dead, but makes use of the present tense in her allusions to him. In her surroundings there is but little to denote the sad tragedy of his death, and all things pertaining to his sickness in the way of pictures, busts, resolutions of respect, and the like are placed by themselves in a memorial room. In her drawing-room is a fine portrait of Gen. Garfield, taken in his uniform; on the piano rests the picture of Queen Victoria, which she sent to Mrs. Garfield, and on a table are a few books, mostly classic authors.

It is understood that no member of the family will go to Washington during the present administration, and Mrs. Garfield doubts if she can ever bring herself to visit again the scenes of the saddest moments of her life.

A Speech by John Bright.

The postscript to the great oration of John Bright before the Glasgow University pleased the students greatly. After speaking for peace and justice, with eloquence approaching the sublime, Lord Rector Bright took his seat amid universal and enthusiastic cheering. When quiet was restored he rose again, and said:

"I am about to tell you a very small anecdote. It bears upon a little business which requires to be done. About sixty years ago, I suppose I was the youngest and the smallest boy in a very nice school, in the town in which I lived; and a most venerable and admirable old lady, the mother of the master, sometimes was specially friendly to me, I suppose on account of my youth; and I was commissioned by the boys on more than one occasion to make my way into the parlor where the good lady sat, and to ask her if she would be kind enough to grant the boys a holiday for the afternoon.

"Well, I see that one touch of nature makes the whole world kin, and the school-boy of sixty years ago and the student of to-day have perhaps an equal anticipation and pleasure from the cessation of their labor even for a day or for an afternoon.

"Perhaps our respected principal of the university will allow me to ask him, or to suggest, if it be not out of order, that he will be as kind to you, as my dear old friend was to me sixty years ago" (loud cheers), "and grant you a holiday, which I now venture humbly to ask of him." (Loud cheers).

Principal Caird replied, "I have an official claim to represent the senate. I do not know whether I have any claim to represent the old lady mentioned by our Lord Rector; but whether or no, if not in the name of the latter, certainly of the former, I gladly concede the request which our rector has done us the honor to make." (Cheers.) "To-morrow will therefore be kept as a holiday."

FIELD AND FARM.

Notes for Farmers.

Sugar made from beets is only two-thirds as sweet as that made from cane.

Wisconsin cheese factories report an active season. There is a general increase in the amount of milk delivered.

The asparagus bed will also be considerably benefitted by an application of this compost; or, if this is not at hand, scrapings of rich earth from the barnyard or from where a manure heap has stood will answer as well, if spread on from three to four inches (or more) in depth.

Colman's Rural World: Just before the last plowing or cultivating of corn scatter rye at the rate of about a bushel and a peck to the acre. It will give admirable fall, winter and early spring pasturage, and put all kinds of animals in first-rate condition. We have practiced this method of seeding to rye for years with the greatest benefit, and recommend it. The same land can be put in corn next season, and the green rye turned under in spring is a great aid in fertilizing the soil.

To CURE BEEF.—For one hundred pounds of beef, nine pounds of salt, two ounces of saltpeter, two ounces of black pepper, and one pint of molassess. Pack your beef in a cask and put all of this mixture over it, then pour boiling water on the beef until covered, cover tight, and you will have corned beef that will keep a year.

We do not know of any practical method of ridding land of cutworms and wire-worms. Applying insecticides is too expensive, and catching by hand rather laborious and tedious work, because the game sought is not only small but usually keeps out of sight. Wire-worms will in most cases be exterminated, or at least disappear, after the land has been cultivated a few years; but the cutworms are more likely to increase.

Liming Eggs.

At a recent meeting of a western dairy an egg association the following directions were indorsed: To make a pickle use stone lime, fine salt and water, in the following proportions: One bushel of lime, eight qaarts of salt, twenty-five ten-quart pails of water. The lime must be of the finest quality, free from sand dirt; lime that will slack fine, white and clean. Have the salt clean and the water pure and sweet, free from all vegetable or decomposed matter. Slack the lime with a portion of the water and salt. Stir well three or four times, at intervals and then let it stand until well settled and cold. Either dip or draw off the clear pickle into the cask or vat in which it is intended to preserve the eggs. When the cask or vat is filled to the depth of fifteen or eighteen inches, begin to put in the eggs, and when they lie, say, about one foot deep, spread around over them some pickle that is a little milky in appearance, made so by stirring up some of the very light lime particles that settled last; and continue doing so as each lot of eggs is added. The object of this is to have the fine lime drawn into the pores of the shells, as it will be by a kind of inductive process, and thereby completely seal the eggs. Care should be taken not to get too much of the lime in; that is, not enough to settle and stick to the shells of the eggs and render them difficult to clean when taken out. The chief cause of (thin, watery whites in limed eggs is that they are not properly sealed in the manner described. Another cause is the putting into the pickle old, stale eggs that have thin, weak whites.) When the eggs are within four inches of the top of the cask or vat, cover them with factory cloth, and spread on two or three inches of the lime that settles in making the pickle, and it is of the first and greatest importance that the pickle be kept continually up over this lime.

Practical Hints Regarding the Care of Children in Hot Weather.

From the Cleveland Leader.

With the arrival of the extreme warm weather cholera infantum has again made its appearance. Four deaths from this disease were reported at the health office yesterday, and it is probable that the number will be increased from day to day until the last of August. No malady is more dreaded by mothers, and none is perhaps more rapid in its action and so universally fatal in its results. During the heated term the little ones are never safe, and mothers cannot exercise too much care regarding their children's food, clothing and bodily condition. "Cholera infantum," said Dr. J. F. Isom yesterday to a Leader reporter, "is as much like Asiatic cholera as it is possible to imagine. It is caused principally by extreme heat. When the temperature at night ranges from 70 degrees upward many cases of the disease may be expected, but if the nights are cool there is not so much danger, no matter how hot the days. During the day, let the weather be ever so warm, a child will not be so much affected by the heat as while sleeping, and for this reason the warm nights cause most of the trouble. Extreme heat in a child's body, will arrest the process of digestion, diarrhea ensues, and if this is not checked it will eventually run into cholery infantum. The disease is sometimes rapid in its action, the little sufferer dying within a few hours after being attacked, while in other cases a child may be sick for weeks with summer complaint before chholera infantum ensue. The discharge in cases of summer complaint is filled with particles of curdled milk, which can not be digested, but in the last stages of cholera infantum the discharge is clear and colorless, like rice-water, and is filled with albumen. This discharge is nothing but the watery portion of the blood which leaks through the intestines. Many children die just as if they had bled to death, but in most cases of cholera infantum the patient's are seized with cramps and spasms, dying in great agony. Teething children are more apt than others to be afflicted with this disease, for the reason that the nervous system is in a constant state of irritation, and the reflex nervous action generally affects the stomach first.

"Yes," continued the doctor, "in the great majority of cases children die from neglect; not that parents do not try to save their lives, but because they do not know how to take care of the little ones. During the warm months the babies should be kept as quiet as possible. During the day it is a good idea to give them plenty of fresh air. They should be permitted to play out of doors in the shade all day, and before they are put to bed at night a cool bath would reduce their temperature and fit them for a good night's sleep. Mothers who nurse children should avoid heating their blood, and the bottles from which youngsters drink should be scalded daily and kept perfectly clear of sour milk. No child suffering from diarrahea should be permitted to go a day without medical attention. These directions if followed, together with a proper attention to dress, will doubtless save the life of many an infant.

Giving the Eggs Rest.

One might very naturally suppose that an article so common and abundant as the eggs of our domestic fowls would have long since been thoroughly investigated, and everything about them worth knowing found out. But it appears that there is still much to be learned even about eggs, for it is a mooted question as to whether in attempting to preserve eggs they should be treated as living organisms requiring air to sustain life, or whether it should be excluded by coating the shell or immersing them in some liquid. A French scientist says that in eggs submitted to incubation immediately after a railroad journey the embryo very generally died, but a few days before incubation obviated this. From this experiment we would conclude that an egg is not only a living organism, but possesses a sensitiveness that is readily injured by any severe shock or ill usage.

Profits of Pork.

It takes seven pounds of corn on the average to make a pound of pork, as is no doubt the case, the farmer begins to see the economy of exporting one pound of pork, bacon or ham, instead of seven pounds of corn. The difference in cost of freight makes a fine profit of itself; besides, the pound of meat is usually worth more than seven pounds of corn in the foreign market. The production of pork should be encouraged on the further consideration that it carries less of the valuable constituent of the soil than beef. The fat pig contains only three-fourths as much mineral matter per cwt. as the fat steer, and only two-fifths as much nitrogen per cwt.; and therefore the production of a ton of pork on the farm will carry off only a little more than half the fertility carried off by a ton of beef. Besides, a ton of beef will require nearly 50 per cent more to produce it. This gives in round numbers the comparative effect of producing pork and beef. It is thus evident that the pig should have a high place in our agriculture; should be fostered in every way; his capabilities studied and pushed; his diseases carefully noted and prevented, for he is the most profitable meat producing animal on the farm. The pig is an excellent adjunct to the dairy, turning all refuse milk and even whey into cash. As he is king of our meat exports, so let us treat him with great consideration.—Chicago Herald.

Hints to the Household.

Sago, prepared like custard and then baked, with apples or other fresh or canned fruit, is a nice dish for a convalescent.

To give consistency to a pie-plant pie, allow to one coffee-cupful of pulp one heaping tablespoonful of cornstarch, then mix with the yolks of three eggs, and use the whites for a meringue.

A pretty way to brighten a willow chair is to tie two bows to the back of the chair, a blue one at the top and a pink or cream colored one below it, at about the centre of the back, or have both of them of scarlet ribbon; tie them so that loops and ends are about the same length.

If a straw hat has been wet and the stiffness has departed, rub a little white of egg mixed with cold water over it; on with a flannel cloth.

Spiced plums are delicious. To eight pounds of plums allow four pounds of sugar, one-teaspoonful each of cinnamon and cloves, one small cup of vinegar. Cook until they are thick as jelly.

A dish which may tempt a failing appetite or be relished by a convalescent is this: Take two or three sardines from the box, drain all the oil from them and broil them, then lay them on slices of watered toast.

If you have occasion to use cloths wet in hot water about an invalid, do not try to wring them out of the water. The best way to prepare them is to steam them; they can be handled then with comparative ease.

Bananas sliced and served with ice-cream are very delicate and dainty. They should be sliced and have a little powdered sugar scattered over them for about half an hour before serving. Set them in the refrigerator for that length of time.

A good way to warm over cold potatoes is to first chop them, not too fine; heat some butter in a frying-pan, and put the potatoes in. Just a few minutes before taking them from the fire stir in some well-beaten eggs. Serve hot.

A pretty ornament for a bracket or shelf in the dining-room is made by gilding, or purchasing already gilded, a little easel which will hold a panel of plush about ten inches high and five or seven wide. To this is to be fastened a small pitcher of china or some fancy ware; it is fastened by having a ribbon put through the handle and then having this tied to the easel itself. A little white china pitcher with a spray of flowers hand-painted is very effective.

A pretty way to vary orange jelly is, after making the jelly in the usual way, to fill the mould half full with the jelly and lay slices of orange in and cover with the rest of the jelly. Pineapple jelly is also very nice with grated pineapple put in this way.

A very nice way to make a cornstarch pudding is to put half a peach in the bottom of a cup and then pour the cornstarch blanc mange over it. When ready to serve turn from a cup into a saucer. Slices or quarters of oranges may be used in place of the peach. A thin custard for sauce is recommended to go with the pudding.

Newspaper Honor.

From Col. G. A. Pierce's Address at Fort Wayne.

A short time ago a discussion arose in Chicago as to the relative duties of lawyers and newspapers, and the following query occurred to me: What would be said of any respectable journal that should take a fee for trying to make black appear white—that should undertake the defense of a notorious murderer, for instance. Not secretly, and while pretending to be impartial—that, of course would be intensely hypocritical and dishonorable—but openly and notoriously? The accused party would say, for instance: "I want defenders. I will hire Lawyer Such-a-One and Newspaper So-and-so." What an outcry would go up, and yet what is it that makes such an act highly dishonorable on the part of the newspaper and perfectly permissable and proper on the part of the attorney? Is newspaper honor held too high? or is legal honor held too low? I believe a time will come when a lawyer's duties will be confined to seeing that murderers and highway robbers have a fair and just trial according to law, and when no amount of money will be allowed to convert them into paid eulogies of dangerous men.

The Shaker Doctrines.

The Shaker doctrines, as now formulated, present the following points: Belief in a God who is over all. That in the Godhead are the male and the female principles, Father and Mother. That created by Him, and sent forth by Him, are many spirits who will guide safely those to whom they were sent. The highest of these spirits is the Christ; first descending upon Jesus, who was the son of Mary and Joseph, and then upon Ann Lee. The direct guidance of every believer by the Christ order of spirits. The rejection of the books called the Holy Scriptures as containing all the word of God. The consequent disuse of the sacraments commanded in the Bible. The enforcement of virgin purity, abstinence from marriage, and from all that offends against chastity. A community of goods, of affection and interests. The following of the moral virtues, love, peace, justice, holiness, goodness, truth. An open confession of every known sin. Temperance, non-resistance, freedom from worldly ambition.

THE PRINCE'S FAVORITE.

The Coming British Belle Who is to Outshadow all Others.

A letter about the Ascott races in England, in the San Francisco Argonaut, contains the following:

Besides well-known faces, there were those of some new aspirants to "beauty" fame, who attracted much attention. Among them Mrs. Francis Baring, Lady Isabella Phuster's daughter, a tall, dark, strapping young woman of nineteen, much in the style of the "Gypsy Gladys," even to her prominent nose and mannish stride; Lady Edith Curzon; Lady Hermione Duncombe, Miss Lane-Fox, and Mrs. George Powell. Though I have put Mrs. Powell's name last, she should really rank first, for I predict that she is the coming beauty who is to outshadow all the others. Unquestionably, she was the most admired, and Miss Chamberlaine's already declining star sank several more degrees below its former zenith. But four-and-twenty, tall, slight, with black hair and eyes, a marble-white complexion and bright scarlet lips, she is a perfect type of the style of the beauty which "fashion" has lately decreed, shall in future be the fashion. Add to that classically chiseled features, the whitest teeth, a willowy figure, a small, rounded waist, hands that take five and a half in gloves, and feet that wear one and a half in boots, and what more can you want? Her dress was a short costume of embroidered white cambric, a small black straw bonnet trimmed with white flowers, and black stockings with white dots. Nobody I spoke to seemed to know much about her, till I met a friend in the Rifle Brigade who had come down on the regimental coach of the Blues. She was a Miss Walsh, before she married, he told me, and her father a clergyman, who for some years was the depot chaplain of his battalion at Winchester.

As she is destined to occupy a prominent place in the gallery of English beauties, a few other things he told me about her may be of interest to repeat in a general way. Five years ago, when but nineteen, she married Captain Powell, a retired army officer of sixty, whose income, from well-invested funds left him by an aunt, and a pretty country place down near Southampton, made ample amends for the disparity of ages. Prior to her marriage, her beauty, handicapped by economical dressing and provincial-made clothes, failed to attract the notice it deserved. But once she got command of the ancient captain's check-book, Redfern's tailor-made gowns, costumes from Worth and Pingat, bonnets from Errington's and boots from the Burlington Arcade, soon wrought such a change that she began to gain attention in the surrounding country. But at last she tired of dazzling the eyes of the very young and equally old army and naval officers she met at dock-yard and garrison balls at Portsmouth and Winchester, to which her aged husband occasionally took her. She had grown to have higher aspirations than the callow admiration and gouty devotion of beardless subalterns and hobbling admirals. So this year she persuaded her husband to take her up to London for the season, and, have her presented. At the second drawing-room, in a Worth-made white satin court-dress, which fitted her like a glove, she made her appearance. That she caught the Prince of Wales's eye at once goes without saying; and an invitation to the first state ball at Buckingham palace, and cards of admission from Mr. Ponsonby-Fane, the Deputy Lord Chamberlain, to the royal enclosure at Ascot, seem but natural sequence. "I wasn't at the ball myself," added my friend; "but I am told the way Wales 'went for' her valses was only equaled by—Just look over there only equaled by that, I should say."

Following his nod and eye, I looked over to where Mrs. Powell's unhorsed victoria was in position. Standing by its side was the Prince of Wales, bending over the door in earnest conversation. Then he opened the door, and, helping Mrs. Powell out, the two sauntered slowly across the lawn together, with—I might almost say—the eyes of Europe upon them. As my friend and I passed on together, in quest of some champagne-cup in the Guards' Club tent, my eyes fell on two women's faces. One was that of the Princess of Wales, and the other Miss Chamberlaine's. The Princess was talking smilingly to Lord Charles Beresford and the Honorable Oliver Montague, but there was an expression in her eye that told me she wished she wasn't the Princess of Wales—just then. As for Miss Chamberlaine, there was an overdone vivacity in her manners as she conversed with three or four titled young heiress-hunters in green veils anh white spats, and despite her assumed look of her mouth, and the verdant-hued glitter in her eyes, as they flashed a side-glance at the promenading couple, told what her real feelings were.

Why He Ran.

An African traveler says that though he has had many experiences with snakes, he was never frightened by them but once, and then he made his best "record" in running. He thus relates how fear gave him an impetus: "One Sunday afternoon," he says, "I took a stroll in some coffee-fields, and from thence scrambled through the bush along the bank of a small stream. The day was intensely hot, and the bush was most agreeable, as I leisurely worked away amid the creepers of many kinds.

"Coming to a semi-clear space, I was enabled to stand up straight and look around. Some few yards off I saw the dark coils of a huge snake snugly ensconced amid the roots of an old tree, with his head turned away out of sight.

"Having only a little stick in my hand, I dared not attack him, but, without thinking, picked up some stones and began dropping them into his coils.

"Suddenly he awoke, instinctively directing his cold glassy eye upon the offending mortal.

"Another irritating stone, and his eyes were bright with passion, his forked tongue darting in and out, to the accompaniment of an occasional hiss.

"I had sufficient common-sense left to step back a few paces ere again insulting his snakeship; and well it was I did so, as, like the lash of a whip when vigorously used, the fellow uncoiled and threw himself at me.

"At a glance I saw that the ire of a 'mamba had been raised.

"Nine feet of live snake-flesh tearing after one relieves the mind of all hesitancy. I turned, bent my head, and with arms advanced to protect the face, charged the bush.

"A hasty glance back spurred me on; another glance showed a hot pursuit. I dashed on.

"I was nearing the clearing, and at last reached the coffee field; but still the enemy was after me. No doubt I measured that hill in an astonishingly short time; at all events I distanced the pursuer.

"Reaching an open space from no danger could be seen approa sank down, feeling rather limp. I had the pleasure of shooting emy some days after,"

The Music of the Locomoti

From the New Orleans Times-Democrat.

"I was loafing around the streets last night," said Jim Nelson, one of the oldest locomotive engineers running into New Orleans, "and as I had nothing to do I stepped into a concert and heard a slick-looking Frenchman play a piano in a way that made me feel all over in spots. As soon as he sat down on the stool I knew by the way he handled himself that he understood the machine he was running. He tapped the keys away up one end just as if they were gauges and he wanted to see if he had water enough. Then he looked up, as if he wanted to know how much steam he was carrying, and the next moment he pulled open the throttle and sailed out on the main line as if he was a half an hour late.

"You could hear her thunder over culverts and bridges, and getting faster and faster, until the fellow rocked about in his seat like a cradle. Somehow, I thought it was old '35' pulling a passenger train and getting out of the way of a 'special.' The fellow worked his keys on the middle division like lightning, and then he flew along the north end of the line until the drivers went around like a buzz-saw, and I got excited. About the time I was fixing to tell him to cut her off a little he kicked the dampers under the machine wide open, pulled the throttle away back in the tender, and, Jerusalem jumpers! how he did run! I couldn't stand it any longer, and yelled to him that she was "pounding" on the left side and if he wasn't careful he'd drop his ashpan.

"But he didn't hear me. No one heard me. Everything was flying and whizzing. Telegraph poles on the side of the track looked like a row of corn-stalks, the trees appeared to be a mud bank, and all the time the exhaust of the old machine sounded like the hum of a bumblebee. I tried to yell out, but my tongue wouldn't move. He went around the curves like a bullet, slipped an eccentric, blew out his soft plug, went down grades fifty feet to the mile, and not a confounded brake set. She went by the meeting point at a mile and a half a minute and calling for more steam. My hair stood up like a cat's tail, because I knew the game was up.

"Sure enough, dead ahead of us was the headlight of the "special." In a daze I heard the crash as they struck, and I saw cars shivered into atoms, people mashed, and mangled, and bleeding, and gasping for water. I heard another crash as the French professor struck the deep keys away down on the lower end of the southern division, and then I came to my senses. There he was at a dead standstill, with the door of the fire-box of the machine open, wiping the perspiration off his face and bowing at the people before him. If I live to be a thousand years old I'll never forget the ride that Frenchman gave me on a piano."

Wit and Humor.

"I am an agnostic!" remarked a young man in swelling accents. "And an agnostic is what?" inquired an elderly gentleman. "An agnostic," replied the fresh youth, in a manner expressive of his pity for his interlocutor's ignorance, "an agnostic is a fellow, you know, who isn't sure of anything." "I see," replied the old gentleman; "but how does it happen that you are sure you are an agnostic?"

"I declare John, I never saw such a man! You are always getting some wrinkle." And the brute calmly replied, "Matilda, you are not, thank fortune. If you had a new wrinkle, you would have no place to put it, dear."

Strict Compliance With a Will.

From the Concord (N. H. Monitor.

A few years ago Mr. George M. Marsh died in Portsmouth, and, after some legacies, left the residue of his property for an Episcopal church to be built in a designated part of that city, where was a mill in which were employed a good many English people, who were too far away to conveniently attend the services in St. John's church. [The mill has since been burned down, and many of the operatives have left the town.] At the time of Mr. Marsh's death his property was thought to be about $40,000, or rather the portion of it left for said church, but owing to an unexpected rise in mining and other stocks, in a little while it more than doubled, till the Trustees to whom it was left found themselves in possession of over $80,000. Now that was a large sum to use in building a church in the not large city of Portsmouth, particularly as there was one Episcopal church there already. But what was to be done? The will expressly said all the money must be put in said church. Could not a portion of it be reserved for an endowment for said church to keep it in repair, and to help to pay the salary of the Rector? No; men learned in the law decided that it must all be put in the church building, and the result is the handsomest and most costly church in the Diocese of New-Hampshire. It is built of stone, in the most solid manner, the style being early English pointed.

General Toombs' health has improved and he will not abandon the practice of law, as had been previously announced.

Forty-four towns of the German Empire have introduced the system of street-car railways, and many more are about to do so.

THE SANDS O'DEE.

Oh Mary go, and call the cattle home,
Across the sands of Dee.
The western gale blew wild and dark with foam,
And all alone went she.

The western tide crept up along the sand,
And round and round the strand,
And o'er and o'er the strand as far as eye could see;
The blinding mist came down and hid the land,
And never home came she.

Oh! is it weed, or fish, or floating hair?
A tress of golden hair,
A drowned maiden's hair above the nets at sea;
Was never salmon yet that shone so fair
Among the stakes on Dee.

They row'd her in across the rolling foam,
The cruel crawling foam, the cruel hungry foam,
To her grave beside the sea.
But still the boatmen hear her call the cattle home,
Across the sands of Dee.

A MAD FANCY.

"Dr. Drake, the man who, in 1859, sunk the irst oil well that was ever sunk in this country, died recently in the poorhouse."

I have seen this paragraph in the papers, and want to contradict it. Contradict it, that is, o a certain extent, for there is no question but hat Dr. Drake did sink the first well, at Titus-ille, and that, through him, many colossal fortunes have been amassed, and many unwily peculators brought to financial grief. But what I do want to say is, that to me belongs he credit of having discovered this immense ine of wealth; this thick, Golcondan stream hat has flooded in and out of the marts of ommerce, bearing some merrily upon its bo-om and utterly overwhelming others in its mpetuous course.

The facts in the case are these:

My name is Claude Malmaison. My father as a well-to-do farmer in the South of France. My mother, a kind, tender, blue-yed woman, who humored all my boyish pranks, and, with her big, mother's love, oothed all the fancied troubles of my child-ood. I have an indistinct recollection of the uaint old village and of the graperies eyond its limits, where we children used to elt each other with the luscious fruit, and queeze it in our little hands, and play hide-nd-seek among the vines. The old pastor, oo, I remember well, with his odd black ress and the sweet benevolence of his dear ld face. Then there comes the recollection of blank in the household, of a dreadful still-ess, and people walking silently through the hambers and speaking in hushed voices. here was a funeral then. My mother was ead, and they bore her out from the house in olemn procession, while I, a mere child, ung myself upon her vacant chair and poured ut my very heart in tears of agony. Ten ears rolled by, and then my father went to oin the wife to whom, in life, he had been er faithful, and, who, in death, must have overed near his bedside, so tranquil was his nd. Then came my trouble. The estate had een heavily mortgaged; clamorous creditors oreclosed, and I was left penniless and at the ercy of relatives. I endured the tyranny of cruel uncle until my young heart could no nger brook the hardships he put upon me, nd then I ran away. Books had told me of e great country in the West—of America—nd to this land of marvelous stories I deter-ined to wend my footsteps. Firmly securing y little savings about my person, I stole out om the house one dark night, and made my ay to Havre, avoiding the high road, and ulking stealthily along until I reached the wn. It was a long and tedious journey, but bore up bravely, and at last, one bright mmer morning, I walked along the piers d saw the maze of shipping, and the tall asts of the vessels standing out against the y in their delicate tracery. My little store as too meager to permit of my purchasing a assage to the object of my destination, and without more ado, I shipped as a cabin boy one of the small trading vessels. Ah! many time I wished myself at home again in the uiet little French village before that voyage as completed! It was a hard and cruel mas-r that I had engaged to serve, and the indig-ties he put upon me send the blood coursing ickly through my veins even at this late day. ll things must have an end, however, and so y misery came to a termination. One night arrived at New York, and next morning escaped from the ship and amed, a homeless, friendless, but still ht-hearted boy through the streets of the eat city. Here, thought I, will I carve my ay to fortune; here win fame and honor. at fame, however, and fortune come not so mbly at the beck of every penniless adven-rer, and long years passed—long years of rd drudgery, of endless toil—before I reach-the goal that placed me beyond want. Don't ncy that I am going to bore you with a long count of my adventures from youth to man-od. They bear but little on the main inci-nt of this true narrative, and, although of terest to the participator in them, will pre-nt but little worthy the attention of the pub-, for whom I am writing this vindication of yself.

The year 1857 found me a scientific farmer ar the pleasant village of ——, in Western nnsylvania. I had been thrifty and indus-ious, and amassed sufficient means to pur-ase a good-sized farm, and was devoting rself to what so few Americans will devote emselves—the science of agriculture. There s much sterile, rocky land upon my posses-ons, which I had endeavored to sell, but the st tempting offer would not induce the wary nnsylvanians to purchase. Disconsolately gazed upon the barren fields! and racked my ains to think of some means by which a sci-ific farmer could turn to advantage such profitable real estate.

The chance presented itself sooner than I agined. One splendid evening—I remem-r it well; it was the 25th day of July, 1857—was sitting upon one of these rocks in my d bargain. It was just before dusk, and the tting sun had left the last halo of his glory mped upon the landscape. At my feet lay — creek, its waters a mass of golden light; ng its shore ran the country road, and now d then the lowing of cattle was carried on e air, and again the merry voices of chil-en broke in upon my meditation. The pale oon shone faintly in the sky, and the dis-t mountain tops stood out—a warm gray-purple bringing up the background a sweet pastoral landscape. Sitting there, mind went back to dear, beautiful France; d in fancy I lived again the boyish, happy e, with all its sunshine and shadow, its joys d its miseries. As I was meditating thus, a rious sound arrested my attention—a low, rgling sound at my feet. Gazing down, I w a small fissure in the rock, from which zed a dark-brown liquid. Surprised at the ange phenomenon, I stooped and gathered me of it in my hand. It was thick, sticky, d impregnated with an odor of bitumen. er in search of discovery, I took a small l, which I chanced to have in my pocket, d filled it with the liquid.

Reaching home, I proceeded at once to the oratory I had constructed, and, locking my-lf in to prevent all interruption, commenced e analysis of this strange product of the il. As I proceeded, my interest became ab-bing. Hour followed hour, and still I sat ere engrossed in my task. What had I und? Was this a dream? No, I had ap-ed every test in the range of chemistry.

At midnight I rose up from my chair, ashy le, my eyes starting from their sockets, my nd trembling like a leaf.

I had discovered oil!—bright, pure oil that, the supply would hold out, would make me millionaire. I, the poor boy, whom a cruel cle had driven from home; I, who had iven, and toiled, and delved for a modest mpetence, held within my grasp a colossal tune!

No sleep for me that night. The next morn-, before the sun was fairly up, I was at the k again. Yes, it was there still—the small, ggish stream, oozing from the bed that had long imprisoned it. I went down on my ees, laughed, prayed, dabbled my hands in d sticky mass and thanked God for his good-ss. I was oil mad!

But there was work to do. Means must be nd to bring the coy treasure from its resting ace. And the labor must be done secretly, . The babbling village gossips must know thing of my discovery. I must toil alone, ust invent machinery to bring it to light. The rm went to ruin; what cared I for that?—I o was to be a millionaire! The neighbors lled me mad. I laughed at them—they knew t of my prize. My models were finished at t, dispatched to the city, and I awaited with verish anxiety the return of the machinery. a day it came, and a band of trusty work-n, sworn to secrecy, bore it to the field. I ected them to the spot, superintended the ting of the massive drills, and then gazed dly at the little stream that was to sail me o wealth.

was dry!

y; and every dollar that I owned in the was represented by these cumbersome , these engines, these heavy drills that there, mute monuments to my insanity. uld not despair, though; the drying-up be temporary; there must be oil beneath. next morning, bright and early, we were work. The neighbors stared at us and red. Some, more curious than others, questioned me. I [illegible] them the bottle of oil I had scooped up and told them my story. They were sorely puzzled, could not understand it, and went among their friends to tell them Claude Malmaison was as crazy as a March hare.

Six weary months dragged lazily along; we had labored unceasingly, but labored in vain. No oil had been poured upon our lives to soothe their troubled waters. I had sold my farm to realize funds to pursue the work; but my money was exhausted now, my companions had gone, and I was left alone, penniless, to curse my folly and begin life anew. Homeless, I had pitched a tent by the side of the well, and here I lived and slept.

One night—it was in September, and the great round harvest moon peered above the tree tops—I had retired earlier than usual and was sleeping soundly, as men will sleep, even in trouble, when I was awakened by a feeling of suffocation. I had been sleeping upon the ground, wrapped in my blanket, and a sluggish stream was enveloping me in its embrace.

I leaped to my feet—was I mad?

No; the oil was pouring from the well in torrents! I danced and shouted in ecstacy, and all the while the rich liquid was coursing down the hillside and floating on the waters of the creek below. Some neighbors, who were passing, encountered the torrent and rushed back to the village to awaken its slumbering inhabitants. Soon they came, men, women and children, armed with pails, kettles and every available receptacle. They were mad as I. Oil, rich, beautiful oil, was scooped up as it rushed headlong from its imprisonment; and by the morning's sun I had filled fifty hogsheads, and the well still flowed.

Five years had passed since that eventful night. Rich, courted, a daring speculator, I stood at the head of the financial column. Investing all the earnings of my first well in land in Pennsylvania, I had become the largest owner in some of the most profitable oil land in the State, and stood now the acknowledged king of the new-found mine of wealth. I was dubbed "Malmaison, the Oil King." Some envied, some admired me—by all I was feared. One great object in life presented itself—the gain of gold. Day and night I toiled. The veriest drudge in my office was not a harder worker than I. And as the money poured into my coffers the mania increased; nothing could satiate my greed. I had imbibed the wild fever of the hour, and must drink the cup to its dregs. Substantial houses tottered around me, fortunes were made and lost in a day, but I stood firm, fortune smiling on my every venture, and gifting me with boundless wealth.

They were hard times, those. In one day oil fell from $10 to 10 cents a barrel. Nature had poured into the world of commerce a new commodity that swamped all others; and on all sides men thought, talked but of oil.

Wells were flowing two, three and six hundred barrels a day; others were flowing one, two, three and six thousand, while one, the Black & Mathewson, flowed 7,500! The men at the wells were as mad as the speculators in Wall street. The oil floated along the surface of Black creek to the depth of six inches, and formed a thick coating to the waters of Lake Erie. A match thrown upon the stream by a careless workman ignited the oil, and the column of flame which roared and hissed along the windings of the creek warned the infatuated wretches of their folly. During the spring and summer of 1862 no less than 5,000,000 barrels of oil floated off upon the waters of Black creek, a total waste. Fifty millions of dollars literally lost!

Men were mad, and I was the maddest of the lot. But it was a lonely life. True, I had every luxury that wealth could purchase. Bright eyes smiled on me, and match-making mammas never omitted my name from their cards. I had purchased a house that was almost a palace, and all the quarters of the globe had contributed in ministering to its magnificence. Here held I high carnival. Sumptuous repasts gathered around my board the wealth, the beauty and the fashion of the metropolis. Still I was very lonely. These people courted and flattered me; but, among them all was not one true friend, not one who would have stretched forward to me a helping hand had I needed it.

Three years more of this passed by, and then it was that my mind went back to that vine-embowered village in France. In the busiest hours of toil a sweet, childish face would pass before my vision. The face of Minette, my boyish love. The face of a Madonna. Simple, childlike, with a wealth of love beaming out of her great blue eyes. Above a mass of blonde hair, that, when the sunshine broke in upon it through the grapevines, shone as a nimbus encircling the face of a saint.

Poor little Minette! How we loved each other in those happy days, and how I would bring the largest bunches and lay them in her lap! And then we would croon and talk to each other in a sequestered corner of the grapery, and as the warm sun shone down from the blue sky above what vows of unending love I made, in my boyish enthusiasm, and sealed them on those chubby little lips. I was to go out into the world and become a great, rich man, and Minette was to be my little wife, and we were to be as happy as the days were long—happier, if such a thing were possible.

I had them now—riches, power—but where was little Minette? On all sides I saw the fairest of the land, and as I paused they smiled beamingly upon me. But they were not for me. I had one vision, one ideal—Minette. I would amass a little more, and then to France, to that sunny village, and there claim my boyhood's love. Until then, toil, unceasing toil.

Musing thus, as one day I walked home from my daily labor, a noise attracted my attention. Tearing down the avenue was a team of spirited horses drawing a handsomely furnished coupe. The affrighted driver had lost entire control of the animals, and instant death seemed imminent for the sole occupant of the vehicle, a young lady.

All my labor had not deprived me of the strength which was inherent in our family, and it was but the work of an instant to leap before the affrighted runaways, and, with an iron grasp stop them in their career. The driver leaped from his seat and held the horses, while I ran to the assistance of the occupant of the coupe.

Could I be dreaming? It was Minette!

She had almost fainted, and lay there quivering among the cushions. How beautiful she was! Years had lent an additional beauty to that sweetness which, as a boy, I had so admired in sunny France. And, as her eyes opened and their great luster beamed upon me, I saw once more the vision that had so long haunted me. It was but a resemblance, though. The beautiful girl, whose life I had saved, thanked me in a bashful, timid way, and then begged me to call and receive the acknowledgments of her parents. Her name she told me was Blanche Suydam, and her residence No. — Fifth avenue. Of course I could but offer to see her home, and, during the short ride hither, I was so charmed with her ready wit, her sunny smile, and the unaffected simplicity of her manner, that the vision of Minette was rapidly dissolving into thin air, and Blanche was usurping its place.

A month found me the honored guest of old Peter Suydam; for wealth went a great way with the good old gentleman, and, though he knew my birth was good, still greenbacks were with him much more substantial things than blood, and I have a suspicion that an overflowing bank account weighed heavier in the old gentleman's esteem than the fairest escutcheon or the bluest of "sang pur."

Another month had passed, and I was Blanche's accepted suitor. A week longer, and she was my affianced bride. Ah! those were golden days, with their happiness in the present, their rich promise in the future. Every day found me by her side, attentive to her every want. At night, balls, parties and the theaters found us always together, the most eager searchers for amusement in the butterfly throng. A certain Captain Anderson hovered just a little to near Blanche to entirely satisfy my jealousy; but she laughed at me for a jealous little goose, and kissed away cross words.

In a month we were to be married; and then came my great sorrow.

It is needless to remind you of the two events of the year 1865—the assassination of Abraham Lincoln and the great inundation which swept away the oil wells and threw the financial world into a chaos of ruin. Deeply involved as I had been in the speculation of the hour, my losses were as heavy as had been my previous gains, and I found myself now reduced, not quite to penury, but so near it that the prospect was appalling. Aghast, I stood and saw my future crumbling away before my very eyes, and I powerless to save it.

In those gloomy days the settlement of my affairs kept me away from Blanche, but in all my trouble I never doubted her love, her fealty. At length all was concluded, and I was a poor man. I had paid every dollar of my indebtedness, and was left stranded on that bank of commerce upon whose sea I had embarked so prosperously.

Then it was I went to Blanche to tell her of my position, to seek refuge from the world, or —cruel thought—to relinquish her, should her parents demand the sacrifice. By her side was Capt. Anderson. She bowed coldly upon me, and said:

"Of course, Mr. Malmaison, under existing circumstances, our union will be impossible. This is Capt. Anderson, to whom I am engaged to be married. The engagement is very sudden, to be sure, but it is none the less sincere. I hope you will often visit us in our new home."

I stammered forth something, I know not what, and then rushed from her presence to pour out my incoherent ravings in the street.

I was ruined, and Blanche had deserted me!

For a week I was almost mad. With unkempt hair and disordered attire I haunted the neighborhood of Blanche's residence, hoping, perchance, to catch a glimpse of the fair face that I had loved so well, but which concealed so much duplicity underneath. It was hard to credit that this woman, whom I had so trusted, so revered, should prove, after all, a mere coquette—an angel in her smiles, a Circe in her heart. But it was of no avail. Either she purposely avoided me or had left the city, for, from the day of my repulse, I have neither seen nor heard of her.

At the end of those miserable seven days of torture I became more contented with my lot, and applied myself to business again. But very little was left of the wreck of my fortune, and this little I determined to invest in a new occupation. Commerce no longer presented to me any attractions, and as I had always had a passion for chemistry, I decided to invest my small capital in the purchase and fitting up of a laboratory, and adopt the profession of chemist. I knew the returns would be small, but some invisible power seemed to be urging me on, and at the end of a short time I found myself the possessor of a small room filled with retorts, crucibles, curiously-labeled bottles and all the other appliances of my newly-adopted profession.

I have said that some invisible power seemed to be urging me on to the step I had taken. Then I knew not what it was. Soon I learned that it was destiny.

Sitting there in my laboratory, poring over the musty tomes of ages, I learned how men, in times gone by, had, like myself, hidden themselves from the world, and from their abode of knowledge sent out unto their fellowmen great works of learning and of benefit. I read of the ever fruitless search for the Philosopher's Stone, that mysterious agent which was to turn baser metals into solid gold, and how the poor enthusiasts had given up their lives in the search. These interested not me, however. Friendless, abandoned, what cared I for wealth, for mankind? The first had but presented to me the golden apple of hope, which was to crumble to ashes ere I could taste its sweetness, while men who courted me in prosperity passed me coldly by, now that the shadow of adversity was upon me.

No, it was not of these I thought, but those books of mine brought to me another idea. The world had discarded me—virtually I was not of it. Why, then, should not I make a world of my own? And, further, why not make this very oil, which had been my ruin, work out my deliverance from the sea of trouble which encompassed me?

Geologists tell us that comminuted vegetable matters disseminated through a matrix of fine argillaceous materials, and forming a black, or carbonaceous, or bituminous shale, are the sources of the production of petroleum oil. Could I but accomplish the feat of reproducing, through the aid of chemistry, in a short time what has been the work of centuries to Nature, might not I achieve a phenomenon that would bring to me my cherished wish?

The task appeared difficult, but feasible, and I devoted myself to it without delay. You may say that this was irreverent, impotential—this assumption of one poor, weak, groveling man to set himself up in competition against the handiwork of his Creator; but, I tell you, my life at this period was such a wretched, dreary blank that anything would have been a relief to its monotonous misery. For one long, weary year I tottered on, hoped on, and then my goal was reached.

Before me—a small, black spot, in the bottom of my crucible—lay the germ of a new world that was to be called into existence by my touch.

The component parts were very simple, and consisted of—but, no; that is my secret, and on that day when the prize lay within my grasp, I made a solemn vow never to reveal it to mortal man.

It was a rough, blustering night in December. The wind moaned in fitful gusts along the deserted streets, and rattled the crazy shutters of my laboratory window. The sleet and hail drove wildly against the window-panes, and all nature seemed to be in discord at the temerity of the atom that had outwitted her.

Slowly I poured the tiny mass of liquid into the small silver plate I had prepared, and with trembling hand applied it to the taper. A thin, bluish flame arose, which flickered for a moment, and in the space of five minutes expanded itself into a wide, luminous circle of fire. The rosin and all its surroundings were swallowed up in the light. I myself appeared to have acquired a new existence, and I stood in a new world—my world—where none could dispute my sovereignty; the world in which I was to reign supreme; where I was to be the be-all and the end-all; the sole possessor, the undisturbed master.

Fool that I was, to dream for one instant that even in this world of fire I could burn out, as in an alembic, the destiny that awaited me.

I found myself in a wide street, bounded at either end by wide, flowing rivers, upon whose calm waters were reflected a sky of Italian purity of color. Upon the opposite shores spread sunny pastures and up-land hillsides, where flowers seemed to blossom in unending summer. Stately mansions reared themselves on each side of the roadway, and a throng of gaily dressed and beautiful beings passed by and rent the air with tuneful melody. It was an Arcadia—a Utopia—which my skillful hand had brought into existence. Buoyantly I passed along, and all smiled upon me as if giving thanks to their Creator. Never before had I experienced such a thrill of joy. I was what man before me never had been—the creator of a world; and as I stood by the river side, and listlessly cast pebbles into the stream, I felt that now had I attained to perfect bliss—had come into that bright existence which De Quincey's opium brought to his fevered brain, and which Swedenborg has expressed as the "Summer Land." It was the "happy hunting ground" of the Indian, the Valhalla of the Norwegian—it was man's vision of purified man.

Meditating thus, I turned to retrace my footsteps, when the cursed vision of my life encountered me. A beautiful woman, with a sweet, thoughtful expression upon her countenance; a great mass of blonde hair, in which the sunbeams seemed to love to linger, and a fair cheek that the wind, in passing, kissed and toyed with in wanton revelry. The same liquid blue eyes, the same winning smile. She was a beatification of Minette and Blanche. Were their visions to haunt me forever—even here?

I strove against the infatuation bravely, but it was useless. The face held me enthralled, and I could but rush forward and speak to the beautiful being before me. Her name, she told me, was Heloise, and, as the words came from her lips, I heard a voice whose melody entranced me. It was hopeless—again I was enthralled. Together we walked, and as she spoke I found her to be a woman of rare endowments—an enthusiast in music, full of quaint book-lore, and richly endowed with all those acquirements—that dignity of mind and manner which culture alone can give.

Surely, a being such as this could not be false—could not be fickle. There was too much good in those beaming eyes, too much maiden purity in that face, too much of God-given truthfulness in that soft voice for this to be a coquette. But I would be wise. Before, I had lost by haste; now, I would bide my time—would assure myself of her faithfulness—would learn her character—would teach her mine; show her of what devotion a man may be capable, and then, when we had both come forth from the fire unscathed—which, for a moment, I never doubted—I would ask her to give me the happiness which in the old, dark world had been denied me.

So lived we happily on together. No shadow of discord arose to darken my sunny dream of love; and the hopes of the past gave golden promise of the being realized in the present. It was a dream, though, too roseate to last—too full of bright imaginings to meet with realization.

I was called to a distant part of the town to attend to important business—for we had business even in this perfect world. For a little week I was away from her side, and then my rival found her; and, lured by his honeyed words, she forsook the man who would have laid at her feet a wealth of love, devotion and tender watchfulness.

Her letter found me as the midday sun cast its rays upon our fire-world, and bathed in mellow warmth the stately minarets of the town hall. Tearing it open, and hoping to find words of love, I found this:

CLAUDE—I love you, but I never can be yours. Often have I told you that my heart, to be taken, must be taken by storm. It has been. One month after you have received this I shall be the bride of Henri Guyson. I trust that you will appreciate the mark of esteem I am conferring in making you my first confidant, and that you will ever be to me what I shall be to you, a friend. HELOISE.

It crushed me at first. Fool that I was! I had dreamt that this woman was true; that she, with her Madonna face, was not as other woman, and that with her I was to lead that life of happiness which before had been denied me. In anticipation I had seen the kindnesses that I was to shower upon her. How with my strong right arm I was to carve my way to name and fortune, and pour into her lap the luxury she loved so well. And now—well, I did not taunt her with her perfidy. I could be as proud as she, and so I smiled and bided my time.

I knew Guyson—a dark, handsome man, with eyes that had a cruel glitter, and a voice that told not wholly of sincerity; with all the vindictive nature of a Creole, jealous and cruel, but with a manner soft and gentle as a dove. Knowing all this, I did not curse—I pitied her. Pitied her—yes, and would save her from the life that must follow if she became his.

It was her wedding day. The church was crowded to repletion. All the wealth and beauty of the fire-world were there. The tall candles gleamed upon the altar, and through the air there stole an odor of incense and of flowers. Soon the organ pealed forth, the massive doors were thrown open, and the bridal party entered. I saw her now for the first time since I had received her cruel letter. She was very pale, and started convulsively when she met my gaze. He was smiling, and looked so cursedly happy that I could have killed him then. But my time had not yet come.

They were standing before the chancel-rail. The priest had spoken the opening words of service and was about to join their hands, when the sharp report of a pistol rang out, and Guyson fell dead!

It was my pistol—my hand that pulled the trigger, my eye that had aimed the bullet which passed through his heart.

In a moment all was confusion. Taking advantage of this, I rushed to support the fainting Heloise. Clasping her in my arms once more, I poured out a passionate entreaty—begged her to fly with me. Told her that for her sake alone had I slain the wretch whose body lay quivering at our feet, and who would have made her fair life desolate had but the rites been consummated which united not one affinity to another. Told her my whole wealth of love, in language which seemed to be sent to me by the giver of eloquence. And then, when I imagined she was relenting, she turned upon me in all the scorn and dignity of her rare beauty, and with haughty tones exclaimed: "You have killed him—kill me. I never loved you; he is and always will be the only man who shall claim me, either in this world or the world to come."

With a rapid motion she snatched the pistol which I held in my hand, placing it to her fair white bosom, and, pulling the trigger, fell at my feet a corpse. A dark red tide oozed up from her bosom, and, throwing myself by her side, I kissed the cold lips, now white in death, and prayed, begged for forgiveness. Implored her to come back to life—to give me but one glance, one smile of pardon. Then my hands were dabbled in her blood, and after that all was darkness.

The next thing I remembered was finding myself in this dark hole, with a band of chattering ninnies gaping around me. And then they tell me it is a lunatic asylum, and that I am a lunatic. Stuff and nonsense! I suppose I have dropped from my own world and come into the old, dreary one again, and that your wise idiots cannot credit my story. I write this, therefore, to set the matter at rest, and call upon whatever sensible person may happen to come across it to come to my relief and take me from this place, where the food is very bad, and where a woman with blonde hair and blue eyes sits in my room and points mockingly at a small red spot in her bosom from which oozes a narrow thread of blood.

THE BABIES IN THE CITY.

When the scorching heat of summer
Beats on millionaire and bummer;
When the rich man's son and daughter
Seek the mountain and the water,
Cooling off at breezy highlands,
Quiet coves and seagirt islands;
Then the babies—oh, the pity!—
Swelter in the crowded city.

Toiling fathers, sons, and brothers,
Helpless babies, hapless mothers;
Sickly babies, weak and ailing,
Moaning, groaning, crying, wailing,
Broiling, baking, stewing, frying,
Fading, failing, gasping, dying;
Helpless babies—oh, the pity!—
Swelter in the crowded city.

Though the blessed air of heaven
Is to man so freely given,
Small the portion of the dwellers
In the garrets and the cellars,
Where the noxious odor smothers
Babies in the arms of mothers,
And the lives that we should cherish
Daily pine away and perish.

When the sultry days of summer
Make the grummest man grow grummer;
When the nights are close and torrid
And the city smells are horrid;
Then the babies, feebly crying,
In their mothers' arms are dying,
As they swelter—oh, the pity!—
In the hot and crowded city.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Equestrian Fashions.

The riding habits worn this season by New Yorkers, when not importations from London, are the handiwork of best New York tailors, and fit the figure with great precision, following the shape closely, even to the skirt, which is cut so as to fall over the rounded knee without curve or wrinkle. The skirt, as has been intimated, follows the outlines of the figure, barely covering the feet when the lady is in the saddle, while the postilion basque comes up about the neck like a little standing collar, above which appears the clerical linen collar. Occasionally the basque is finished with turn-down collar and lapels, but the first-named style is the preferred one. The sleeves are of snug-fitting coat shape. With the short, narrow riding skirt trousers of the same material as the dress are a necessity and are consequently a part of the habit. An exclusive English style not generally adopted here consists in trousers fitted over the ankle. The more usual fashion is expressed in straight trousers. Stockinet, because of its pliable nature, is preferred by some ladies for trousers in place of cloth. The popular color for riding habits is very dark blue, while the newest is wine color. Latest English fashions prescribe a black silk hat with a curved brim as the correct head-dress for equestriennes. These silk hats are very similar in style to those worn by gentlemen this season. While English and French women are wearing silk hats, the majority of New York ladies patronize the English Derby hat, or jocky cap, of color corresponding with the habit. English women wear the legged boots for riding, and these are provided in this country, but most of our women are content with laced boots that come up high about the ankle. Mousquetaire gloves, drawn up over the outside of the sleeve, are a favorite, though buttoned ones are worn. Dog-skin gloves with lapped seams are gaining favor both for riding and driving. Ladies' saddles are being made now with what is termed the leaping horn, which is a decided assistance in keeping a firm seat in the saddle, and is much patronized by beginners and timid horsewomen. The saddle blanket ought to correspond in color with the lady's habit, and is made of felt. The rider's crest or monogram is usually embroidered upon it in a shade of the same color. With the disappearance of the dangerous long riding skirt the slipper stirrup has fallen into disuse, and in its place has appeared the padded stirrup. For saddle harness come two styles of bridle—the double one with two bits and the single one-bit bridle. Whips for lady equestrians come in as great a variety of styles as do gentlemen's canes. The favorite whip is the hunting cane without a lash. A popular finish to the handles is a silver knob; buckhorn is also much used for the same purpose.

Table Decoration.

The most successful dinners are unquestionably those, whether large or small, where most attention is paid to detail in appointment. The most recherche dinner is spoiled if served in a slovenly manner or without regard to appearance: while, whatever epicures may assert to the contrary, a snowy damask, bright glass and shining silver, harmonious lighting, and the soft influence of flowers may atone for even such execrable shortcomings as lack of pepper in the gravy. Next in importance to the company is the aspect of the table, if it is not even greater. And in ordinary home-life the appearance of the dinner table is a sure indication of the refinement of the housekeeper. One cannot overestimate its importance in families where the dinner ought to be the most social hour of the day, the one in which the household machinery should work with greatest ease, and in which the eye should be charmed as well as the palate. A very lovely decoration for the table consists in floating water-lilies, with their large leaves, the requisite receptacle for them being a large, shallow crystal basin. The small set pieces to surround a center piece or decorate the corners of a table are still in favor, although they have long ceased to be novelties; they are excellent in winter or in homes where economy in flowers must be studied, because they can be filled with moss and made extremely decorative by the help of a mere sprinkle of blossoms. In many houses artificial flowers are used in them in the winter months, and even when flowers are cheap they are occasionally used with them. The lighting of a well spread dinner table is almost as important as its decoration. There is nothing so depressing as a dim, religious light, and in spite of the preference the fashionable world evinces for a semi-dark atmosphere in living rooms, there is a unanimous desire for brilliant light at entertainment. Scences and candelabra are invaluable for this purpose, and the most popular style to-day is that which combines lighting with another use, as in the case of the center pieces alluded to above. Colored and decorated wax lights are serviceable, and there is an increasing tendency to depend upon the softened light of many candles in preference to the glare of gas in luxurious homes to day.

Bangles.

In the East nowadays bangles appear on everything—hair combs, belts, garters, fans, tidies, hats, necklaces, breastpins and finger rings. But the most popular use is for bracelets. The first step a girl takes toward the accumulation of bangles is the purchase of a pair of very narrow band bracelets of either gold or silver. The trinket should be supplied with a number of tiny hooks, to which the bangles are attached as they are received. This is all she can do in the matter. Her admirers—those scrutinizing young chaps who are always in search of some attribute or some characteristic which does not exist, must complete the fancy. As the gifts are nearly all from gentlemen, it is a pretty hard test of friendship to have a pretty girl flaunt a pretty trinket on a pretty white arm in his face, and know that his monogram is not among the chosen ones. All men have not the strength of good, stupid Saint Anthony, and cannot withstand the ordeal. The result is that these bangles accumulate so rapidly that the little belle is at a loss what to do with them. Not unfrequently the monograms of the indifferent are hung on garters or trim the ends of table scarfs or felt tidies and mantel hangings. In the East some ingenious girls wear them around the bottom of apron overskirts. As a whole, the fashion is not a pretty one, for the simple reason that it is "loud." At the high schools of the city the professors are so annoyed by the ceaseless jingle that they request the young ladies to remove the "nuisance" before coming to class. If some such method could be employed at the fashionable churches there would be fewer frowns and less internal eruptions among the men who are unable to lend ear to any part of the service without being distracted by the rattling of dimes and quarters with every movement of the wearers. Albeit the craze is sanctioned by the aristocracy, who employ small gold coin, engraved and enameled, for pendants, still the estimation is by no means high, and the patrons are forced to admit that the whim is adopted more to satisfy personal vanity and social rivalry than anything else. The craze has already begun to show signs of waning from the fact that it is spreading like any common plague, and it is only a question of a short time when the fashion will be abandoned.

Summer Party Refreshments.

Meringues, which are pretty to serve with cake at a summer evening entertainment, are made after this recipe: To one pound of pulverized sugar allow the beaten whites of eight eggs; beat the sugar and eggs slowly together; sift a little sugar over a sheet of thick white paper, and drop from a spoon the mixture of sugar and egg upon it. A tablespoon evenly full will make them the proper size and shape. Allow about two inches of space between them. Have the oven so hot that they will bake with the door left open, so that you can watch them: the moment they are browned take them out. If you choose to take the trouble, remove the soft inside, and fill with ice cream or with red jelly. A deep platter with whipped cream in the center and the meringues around the edge is a handsome ornament for the table.

Chocolate cake still retains its popularity, and some one seems to be experimenting on it continually. Here is a new way to frost the top: Make a regular boiled frosting; after the sugar will "hair" from the spoon, pour it over the well-beaten white of the egg, and, after stirring this for two or three minutes together, beat in as much grated chocolate as you choose; if you like the flavor, two heaping tablespoonfuls will do for one egg. The cake may be made after any good, rich recipe; it should be baked in broad, flat tins, and pains must be taken to have it smooth on the top. If it should rise much in the center, cut the excrescences off. Leave the cake in the tins, and put a strip of paper around the cake inside the tin; join it as tighly as you can, and then pour the frosting on; it may need to be smoothed with a knife wet in hot water. Set it where it will keep cool, though not in a refrigerator. Leave the cake in the tin and cut it while in there; cut it in square blocks. It may trouble you to cut the first piece, but after that is out it will be an easy matter to cut the rest. This cake keeps well.

Women and Counterfeits.

In many branches of the treasury service women have arisen to the proficiency of experts. This is especially true as to the office of the treasurer of the United States, where the most expert, rapid and accurate counters of mutilated currency and detectors of counterfeit money are women. A woman detected the first counterfeit $100 bill of that very dangerous issue. When called upon to explain why she thought it was counterfeit, her answer was, "I knew it was." It took a day or two for the engraver, and cashiers to make a detailed explanation so that bank officials could understand the reason. However, it was discovered that those same cashiers and bank officials had received a good many of the bills, while the woman had detected that they were counterfeit. Gen. Spinner, when treasurer of the United States, once said: A man will examine a note systematically, and deduce logically, from the imperfect engraving, blurred vignette, or indistinct signature, that it is counterfeit, and he will be wrong four cases out of ten. A woman picks up a note, looks at it in apparently careless manner, after her own fashion, and says: "That is counterfeit." "Why," the division chief will ask, and she will be very sure to answer "Because it is," and she is right eleven cases out of twelve.' It would be wrong to say that these discoveries are the result of chance. They come from a keen perception, fine eyesight, delicate touch, and long acquaintance with the work. There is in one of the bureaus to-day a woman whose division chief says that her daily average of work, in the counting of stamps, is nearly three times that of a man who has been assigned to the same duty, and who sits in the same room, yet the man gets twice the pay.

Ladies as Drivers.

Southern ladies excel in horseback riding and Western ones in driving. The former are placed in the saddle at an early age, hence never experience timidity or show that awkwardness women are liable to express who have been trained at more mature years in riding schools. Eastern women bear the palm as regards stylish habits and fine turnouts, but, as a class, they are neither graceful horsewomen nor skillful drivers. The secluded country paths and broad carriage roads are admirable places for practice, and it is quite pro bable that the opportunities afforded during the summer for this practice will result in improvements that will be felt later on by gentlemen with fast teams, who have been disposed, heretofore, to complain not a little of the careless driving of the fair sex. Silver mountings are in style for fine harness. A composition plate resembling gilt is much employed for light road harness. Carriage rugs are made of many materials, but they correspond in color and finish with both the carriage linings and its trimmings. The pad cloth must also match in color and material the carriage upholstery. Liveries are sometimes corded with contrasting colors. During the summer season striped waistcoats will be worn. In these stripes the color of the cord on the livery will alternate with white stripes. On the waistcoats of coachmen and grooms these stripes will run up and down, while footmen will wear waistcoats with stripes running across.

Bathers at Bay.

"Yes, sir," said Prof. Thomas W. Tobin to a Louisville reporter, "Crab Orchard Springs is a very pleasant resort; and there is a nice company of summer idlers there. I have been there some days, and feel much invigorated. It is run on the religious basis now. You cannot find a bar-room; but you can have drinks sent to your room. By the way, there was almost a fatal case of mistaken identity up there last week during the hot spell. Several of the most popular ladies of the Springs concluded to go bathing one afternoon. They took the greatest precautions as to their destination and safety from intrusion. They took Jim Robinson along to guard them—Jim, by the way, being a dog named after the late popular manager. They took along, also, some light netting and nun's veiling to improvise into bathing suits, there being no suits discovered at the Springs. Well, it went along very nicely for a while. Jim sat upon the bank and watched the clothes, and not a cloud was athwart the bathing horizon. The ladies, having pinned on the light draperies, made a dive into the pellucid waters. When they came to the surface and walked up in the shallow water there was a change in Jim's demeanor. Jim had been instructed to keep men away, and when the ladies emerged the wet draperies were clinging so closely that Jim's mind became disturbed, and, having strict orders, he took them for men, and setting up a bark like a wolf he went sailing fiercely into the water after the ladies. They tried to quiet him, but he snapped at them so viciously that they ran shrieking out of the water and up the bank. By this time some gentlemen fishing at a distance had become alarmed, and came rushing up to see what was the matter. This produced fresh screams, and Jim's barking fire was divided. The ladies hid behind trees, and with difficulty and much disgust succeeded in persuading the gentlemen that they were merely romping with Jim. However, there was no more bathing that day, and mosquito bar bathing suits are at a discount at the Springs."

Irish Lace.

There is being held at present at the Mansion house in London an exhibition of Irish lace. Very fine specimens are contributed to the loan section of the exhibition by the princess of Wales, the Princess Christian and numerous other ladies, by whom the beautiful make of some kinds of Irish lace has long been recognized. The list of trade exhibitors includes the more important London houses; but, curiously enough, only one house in the whole of Ireland. When it is remembered that the social condition of the Irish people favors in a remarkable degree the extension of handwork as a home or cottage industry, it seems curious that lace making, instead of taking permanent hold of the districts into which it has been introduced, has generally proved to be a more fleeting or transient industry. Small holdings and large families, the habit of "the boys" seeking work in Scotland and England, and a consequent surplus female population at a loss for occupation, except when manufactures have been established, as at Blarney, are precisely the conditions under which cottage industry should flourish. Yet all the lace industries which now exist can be traced back to an origin within the present century. Earlier attempts to establish lace making appear to have died out from some unexplained reason. Lady Arabella Denny taught the children in the poorhouse to make what was called "bone lace" as early as 1743, but the result of her efforts was not very durable. There has been lace making which has left traces in Kerry, at Milltown, Killarney and Kenmare; in County Cork, at Clonakilty and Kinsale; at Tallagh, Waterford, Clonmell, Euniscorthy, Thomastown, Kilkenny, Burrosleigh, Carlow, Maryborough and Kildare. Between these southern districts and the northern bygone centers of lace making there is a great gap. Lace was formerly made, it would seem, at Armagh, at Strabane and at Malin in the extreme north of Ireland; but in all these places the industry perished by degrees from causes, among which the keen competition of artistic Belgium was perhaps not the least powerful. Possibly also the introduction of Nottingham machine lace helped to extinguish the lighter fabrics, except of the very highest class; and "bone lace" or the imitation of the old Italian raised point has never been an article in very large demand, except for ecclesiastical vestments. These causes, combined with the comparatively high price asked for Irish lace, may have killed off a promising industry; but to whatever malign influence it may be assigned, the fact is clear that the old centers died out and that the new ones have been formed by vigorous individual effort, requiring even now to be supplemented by systematic instruction in the art of design. This in great part explains its cost.

Summer Wedding Toilets.

The designs and colorings of the new sateens are very beautiful. As a rule, the grounds are closely covered by the patterns, but in some charming exceptions the fond is of a decided color, with scattered flowers of delicate, contrasting hues, such as primroses and carnations on a dark laurel-green ground, pink oleander blossoms on nuns' gray, and mauve on dark violet, and vice versa. Pretty and inexpensive wedding dresses are made of white sateen, with lace-trimmed kiltings of the plain material for the underdress, and either white brocaded sateen for the bodice and tunic, or a white ground, with gold buds and leaves scattered over the white ground. The bridesmaids are then properly attired in sateens, brocaded with pale blue forget-me-nots, laurel blossoms, or daffodils. With lace trimmings and other dainty accessories in the shape of flots and ends of gay ribbons matching the tint of the flowers of the brocade, pretty fans and parasols, and picturesque hats, lace-trimmed and brightened with flowers, long Danish kid or white silk gloves drawn on to reach the elbows, no more charming toilets need be desired, either for a wedding or a garden party. In the matter of ribbon trimmings, they were never worn in greater profusion. Many of these, and naturally the most expensive, are hand painted; other pattern ribbons are embossed or printed, some of the designs in the latter being very eccentric, and some exactly matching the figures on the sateen fabric. Plain and reversible ottoman ribbons of two colors are lavishly used for flot bows, draping tunics, trimming the entire fronts of matinees, raising skirt draperies and for trimming bodices and sleeves. Loops of ribbon are employed to edge the jaunty Hungarian bodices, and rows of loops are frequently laid across the top of a silk or satin kilting to head it. Similar loops are then laid down the front of the corsage, mingling with the lace garniture, the falls of ribbon and lace decreasing in width as they reach the belt. This gives an effective finish, and is generally becoming.

Worth's Dressmaking.

Two young ladies of my acquaintance were in Paris last summer, and, after the manner of most good Americans, they went to Worth to order some dresses. He looked them over critically and then asked them to walk across the room. They did as they were bid; but alas! after thus putting them to their paces he shook his head and said: "Ladies, I can do nothing for you." He did not think them stylish enough to do justice to his dresses. I thought before they told me this anecdote that it was Worth's dresses that made the style, and not the style that made Worth's dresses. This is something to remember. Dressmaking, when it becomes a fine art, is a very paying business. Our best dressmakers, mostly Irishwomen with French names, think nothing of asking $150 for a simple lawn dress, and anywhere from $200 to $500 for a street or carriage dress. As there is about 200 per cent profit in this they soon lay by a lot of money. They will tell you that their rents are shockingly high because they must live in a fashionable neighborhood; but they won't tell you that they let out half of their house to gentlemen lodgers, which quite pays them this "shocking rent." The most of our fashionable dressmakers go to Europe every summer to lay in a stock of goods for the winter. Here is where they make, too, for they charge enormously for their importations; and as they sometimes smuggle them into this country their profits are doubled. A great many of these dressmakers have friends among the officials, and very few of them pay duties.

Garden Party Dresses.

A garden-party dress, worn by a tall brunette in New York lately, was as follows: The round skirt was of strawberry satin, embroidered in very dark red poppies and foliage down the front. Folds of the satin descending from the bodice were arranged to represent paniers. The train was of rich pink brocade, detached from the skirt, to which it formed a sort of background, and was caught up on one side with a tuft of red and rose-colored feathers. The pointed bodice of strawberry satin was laced up the back, cut square front and back, with a lace bertha folded across the chest, made of strawberry-tinted Spanish lace matching the ruffles of lace around the bottom of the round skirt. The gloves were of cream-tinted Swedish kid, and the lady wore in her dark hair a tuft of rose-colored tips, with a pink aigrette. Another toilet was of French gray satin, embroidered in white silk, with an enormous sash of white satin finishing the paniers in the back, the loops and ends falling over the train, the looping beginning several inches below the waist line. En suite with this dress was a white satin parasol lined with pale pink merveilleux, and edged with a deep Venetian lace ruffle of exquisite design and finest texture; a fan of white ostrich feathers, with mother-of-pearl handle, and a Sir Peter Lely hat of gray satin braid, faced with pink, and trimmed outside with white lace and white ostrich plumes.

Ladies Playing Poker.

The great crowds have not yet begun their rush for Coney Island, but they will begin in a very few days. The Sheepshead Bay races have drawn enormous crowds on certain days; among them a great many ladies. Ladies are fond of racing, and they don't object at all to winning a little money by buying French pools. I find that women are fond of games of chance, from racing to poker, and they are apt to have pretty good luck. It is not always luck, for some of them are very clever card players, and they do not play for penny points, either. A young lady of my acquaintance was invited to a lunch party at an acquaintance's home not long ago, and after lunch it was proposed that they play a little game of cards. My friend supposed that the game would be "old maid," or "casino," or some other of these old-fashioned lady's games; but, bless your heart, it was poker they proposed. She didn't know the game. So they substituted whist, and before the afternoon was over she had lost $10 to her hostess. She thought, of course, that it was a joke, and said: "I am in your debt $10, I believe; oh, very well, I will pay you when next we meet." "I hope that you will," said the hostess, "ladies should be very particular about paying debts of honor." My friend discharged the obligation, and then broke off the friendship.

Sketch Books.

Very many ladies have a habit while traveling of gathering leaves, sprays, or single blossoms, small reminiscences of pleasant journeys, etc., and pressing them in a sketch book or small portfolio, previous to their being taken home and prettily arranged in the long winter evenings, when they awaken pleasant or sad remembrances, as the case may be, of days long past. The dried flowers, leaves, grasses, mosses, etc., should be arranged on pieces of cardboard cut the same size, either in different groups of flowers, or like a graceful frame around a small sketch, with a quotation from a favorite poet below: in this case the single flowers must be gummed on with a thick liquid gum, which, of course, requires great care. If kept in a case on purpose, the collection will soon form a pretty album.

Perfectly Charming.

Amber is a very fashionable color, and one of the most beautiful importations from Worth is an amber satin reception costume. The court train opens over a petticoat of ruby velvet, covered with very deep amber lace flounces. The bodice is pointed and sleeveless, and is trimmed with a magnificent embroidery of gold, ruby and amber beads, which glisten like gems in the gaslight, this embroidery heading a fall of amber lace.

Jersey suits, consisting of a plaited skirt of cashmere or flannel in gay plaid, worn with a jersey in some color to harmonize, are very popular, and charming evening costumes are made by taking a jersey in some bright color or delicate evening shade, trimming it with collar, cuffs and border of open embroidery turning up on the jersey, and wearing it over a white skirt covered with flounces of embroidery to match.

Ginger cordial is made of four pounds of red or white currants, eight ounces of ginger root, two ounces of bitter almonds, one-half ounce of sweet almonds, three lemons sliced, one gallon of whisky. Mash the currants, cut the ginger root in small pieces, crack and split the nuts, pour the whisky over these ingredients, and let it stand for ten days; then pour it off carefully, add four pounds of loaf-sugar, and bottle it.

The secret of success in making white sponge cake is in the thorough mixing of the ingredients. The flour should be sifted, in the first place: then sift the flour and sugar together, then the one small teaspoonful of baking powder. For one loaf use eleven eggs—the whites only are required—one large cup of flour, and one and a half of sugar. If possible do not open the oven door while the cake is baking.

Little cakes, called "love knots," are nice for tea: Five cups of flour, two of sugar, one of butter, a piece of lard the size of an egg, two eggs, three tablespoonfuls of sweet milk, half a teaspoonful of soda; rub the butter, sugar and flour together fine, add the other ingredients, roll thin, cut in strips one inch wide and five inches long, lap across in true love knots, and bake in a quick oven.

Dressy basques are cut open in oval shape below the throat, and finished off with a standing net collar embroidered with gold, silver or steel beads, and made to project by fine thread-like wires, and fastened by a diamond brooch that represents buttons. The sleeves are of lace to the elbow with beaded ruffles, and there are satin crevets for epaulets.

Gloves and hose and parasol may be brown or red, or gloves and parasol of the red and hose brown with red checkings. With this the low walking shoes would be very pretty. They are trimmed with patent leather and have lacings to fasten them over the instep. The heels are medium height, but not French, and the toes pointed.

Fashionable small girls wear their dresses quite short, coming but little below the knee. The stockings are very long, and the short drawers do not show. As the girl grows older the dress is gradually lengthened, and Miss in her teens wears it to the top of her high shoes, or perhaps a little shorter, if she has older sisters.

A pretty costume for a miss of twelve years is of ecru pongee with tapered plastron, and broad sash of seal brown silk. The dress is cut square at the neck over a yoke of Irish point embroidery, and the skirt has a straight drape cut in tabs and bound with brown silk over knife pleatings of pongee alternating with silk.

New yachting costumes are of dark green flannel, with ecru kid for the vest and collar. Terra cotta serge dresses have a white sailor collar, with gilt anchors, and navy blue serge dresses have many rows of white braid, with white anchors on the collar, which is deep enough to serve as a cape.

Princesse slips and pleated English sacques are the favorite shapes for the useful ginghams which most mothers prefer for morning wear in the country and at the seaside, while the sailor suit of flannel continues indispensable to every girl's wardrobe for damp, cool days.

A very pretty imported model is of polka dotted foulard, cream with garnet dots, with full-puffed Bernhardt plastron down the front of garnet surah and wide sash of the same coming from under it, caught up at the back in a full bow and loose ends.

A good way to warm over cold boiled potatoes is to first chop them, not too fine; heat some butter in a frying pan, and put the potatoes in. Just a few minutes before taking them from the fire stir in some well-beaten eggs. Serve hot.

Although cheap things are not always economical by any means, torchon for the bottom of the baby's short flannel petticoat is a good as well as cheap finish. It will wash so much better than embroidery that it is very satisfactory.

The traveling cloak for young ladies' summer journeys is a cheviot Newmarket, closely fitted from neck to foot, with checks of mingled ecru, garnet, brown and olive. There is a pointed hood with garnet silk lining.

Flower necklets or dog collars of small roses, apple blossoms, forget-me-nots, pansies or daises make a pretty and tasteful heading for a deep lace frill or collarette, but they are suitable only for evening wear.

Pique dresses are made in one piece, either sacque or princesse, for girls under eleven, over ten they wear the two-piece suit, jacket and skirt, the jacket almost as long as a polonaise.

Many ribbons are worn—sashes, bows, shoulder knots and full bows on the hair, which is shingled or straightly banged in front, and crimped and left flowing behind.

Silk gloves in the popular jersey shape will be worn during the summer, and are embroidered along the back of the hand and across the arms.

Very thin cotton or lisle hose are often worn under the black to protect the feet from stain and the hose from being faded by the perspiration.

The bridesmaids at a recent wedding in English high life wore buttercup-colored India mull over silk slips, with garniture of crimson roses.

Pretty tea aprons are made of Oriental net, with ruffles of Oriental lace over strawberry surah, and also of ficelle lace over pale-blue satin.

A favorite shape in large hats is that of the scallop shell with pleating of ribbon inside the brim and long looped ribbon bows on top.

Linen band collars have two button-holes near the upper edge, through which narrow ribbon is run and tied in a long-looped bow.

Waistcoats are again in favor; they are made just like a man's, and over them is worn a little cutaway jacket with loose fronts.

Stockings must match the dress or the ribbon worn with it in color; black stockings are, however stylish with every color.

Very few mothers let their children wear low shoes, since physicians condemn them as a fruitful source of weak ankles.

Polo caps are a popular fancy for evening wear on lawns and beach after the sun is low, both for girls and boys.

Loose fronts, a la Berndardt, are becoming to misses, and are also much liked for small girls.

Wide round hats, shirred hats of gingham, and Kate Greenaway bonnets are alike popular.

Boys wear only dark-colored or gray hose, and for them, also, black is the acme of style.

THE FISHING SONG.

Down in the wide, gray river
The current is sweeping strong;
Over the wide, gray river
Floats the fisherman's song.

The oar-stroke times the singing,
The song falls with the oar;
And an echo in both is ringing
I thought to hear no more.

Out of a deep, dark current
The song brings back to me
A cry from mortal silence
Of mortal agony.

Life that was spent and vanished,
Love that had died of wrong,
Hearts that are dead in living,
Come back in the fisherman's song.

I see the maples leafing;
Just as they leafed before;
The green grass comes no greener
Down to the very shore—

With the rude strain swelling, sinking,
In the cadence of days gone by,
As the oar, from the water drinking,
Ripples the mirrored sky.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

Vanderbilt has just given $100,000 for the further endowment of Vanderbilt university in Tennessee, which was an especial object of his father's beneficence. It was a generous gift, but did not involve much sacrifice—only his income for a week.

The lists of failures for some months past have been quite large, compared with those of the preceding years, but one-fourth as many business failures have occurred in Canada as in the United States. In proportion to the population of the two countries, financial wrecks were three times as numerous in the dominion as on this side of the border. It is gratifying to know that failures are decreasing at the present time on both sides. The boom of business leads to extravagance and the contraction of debts. These things are infectious, and often the most conservative are insensibly led beyond their depth. The recent business rebuses are simply the results of too much confidence in the future, and will have a wholesome effect in preventing a general revulsion.

Pension Commissioner Dudley believes that the great increase in the number of claims entered is due largely to the increased number of pension agents who want the ten dollar fees. The number of attorneys who practice before the department has increased from 4,000 to 16,000 since the last law was passed. It is impossible that the increase in the number of claimants is partly due to their increasing age. There are many men who suffered more or less disability from service in the army, and many widows who have been able hitherto to care for themselves, but who find with increasing age, that a little help from the government, if it can be obtained, would be a comfort. While we must resist fraud to the utmost, there is no reason why these sufferers should not be dealt with equitably if they want help.

Frenchmen in France and in other countries, celebrated with great enthusiasm on the 14th, the fall of the Bastile, one of the most important and stirring events of the Revolution. For a period of four hundred years the prison had received within its gloomy walls prisoners sometimes committed without trial and guiltless. On the 14th of July, 1789, the French mob attacked it in the name of "liberty and equality." It had long been looked upon as a symbol and haunt of despotism, and there was a rejoicing throughout Europe at its fall. A few like Duc de la Rochefoucault felt that "it is difficult to enter into true liberty by such a gateway," but the majority saw in the destruction of the Bastile the dawn of freedom to the French and a national deliverance. In most of the larger cities of the United States, there were processions with tableaux representing scenes in the Revolution, and singing of the Marseilaise, with literary exercises and banquets.

The Boston Herald, referring to the trouble between Pope Leo and a portion of the Irish clergy commends the statesmanship of Leo, which has changed in a great measure the relations of the church with European governments. The distinguishing characteristic between the policy of Pope Leo and that of his predecessor is that, while the latter was utterly indifferent to the opinions and wishes of the governments of Europe, the former has attempted to conciliate the ruling powers all over the continent. Pope Leo inherited quarrels with Germany, Russia, Italy, and even Austria. By diplomatic tact, he has succeeded in wholly regaining lost ground in Russia; so much that the Roman Catholic church to-day stands in a better condition in that country than it ever has before. In Austria the relations between church and state are wholly harmonious; in Germany, most of the causes for quarrel have been obliterated, while even in Italy the opportunities for peace are much more encouraging than any one could have supposed they would be ten years ago. Pope Leo has made these gains—and, considering the interests involved, they are exceedingly great ones—by throwing his strength in favor of conservative methods, and by opposing those outbursts of popular feeling which have their display in lawless acts.

A movement is on foot for the organization of what is called a "federation of trades," which if realized, will result in the most formidable labor organization this country has ever known. The outlines of the plan for the proposed federation, as given by Secretary Martin of the Amalgamated association to a representative of the New York Times, are as follows: First, for each trade to organize by itself; second, for each trade that is strong enough to form a national association; third, each trade, without foregoing any of the control of its own affairs, harmoniously to affiliate with other trades, so as to render and receive aid when necessary; fourth, the national associations to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a federation. The primary object of the federation would be to secure mutual aid during strikes, not only in a financial way, but in such other ways as would tend to bring strikes to a sudden and successful termination. Beyond this, the federation would aim to so influence legislation as to promote the protection and advancement of labor interests, and would keep committees at Washington and at state capitals "at the right time to reach legislation." These committees, Mr. Martin explains, "would be backed by millions of voters, and hence would be influential."

1 The barn of H. C. Howard in Fairbault was burned the 18th with its contents, including a lot of agricultural machinery belonging to C. A. Wood, whose loss will be $500. Howard's loss is $2,400, and insurance $1,100.

Phinney & Jac son, merchants, of Portland, Me., have spended with liabilities of over $200,000. They claim assets are due from Cuba sufficient to meet their engagements.

SATURDAY'S CYCLONE.

The Storm Passed Through Several Counties in Minnesota, Dakota and Wisconsin—Destruction to Life and Property from Huron, Dak., Nearly to the Mississippi River.

WIDESPREAD DISASTER.

The hurricane on Saturday morning seems to have originated in the vicinity of Hitchcock, on the northern boundry of Beadle county, Dak., reaching from that point north as far as Redfield. Numerous buildings were torn down and several persons wounded, some fatally. Passing east the storm is next heard of in Codington county, where much damage was done, particularly to the crops. So far as can be heard from the dispatches, it was next learned of at Sleepy Eye, Brown county, where it was accompanied with terrific hail. From there it went to New Ulm, and crossing the Minnesota river, passed on through Nicollet county to St. Peter, laying waste the crops in its course. From St. Peter it seems to have followed the general course of the Winona & St. Peter road through Kasota, Janesville, Waseca, Meridan, Owatonna, Dodge Center, and Mantorville to Rochester, where it made a sharp turn to the northeast to the village of Elgin, Wabasha county, which it almost completely demolished. Beyond this point the force of the storm seems to have been broken, little damage being reported from the eastward.

The list of casualties is a long one, and the damage to property is very large. Thus far eight are reported killed and about sixty more or less seriously injured. The blowing of a passenger train from the track near Owatonna resulted in the injury of some forty people. The town of Elgin suffered most severely, being almost completely wiped out, and several being killed. A complete account of this disaster, however, is unattainable owing to the telegraphic trouble and the fact that the town is some distance from the railroad. The loss to property cannot as yet be estimated, but is very great.

Dodge county, was the scene of disaster and general wreck, both to buildings and the crops. Owatonna and Waseca are also heavy sufferers, the buildings on the State fair grounds at the former place being entirely destroyed. As yet returns are so incomplete that no estimate is attempted of the loss either to the crops or to other property, but as the path of the storm was through a productive agricultural country, the aggregate amount will undoubtedly be very large.

The Loss of Life and Property.

KILLED AND INJURED.

The following is the list of killed and injured by the storm of Friday, so far as has been ascertained, and of the property destroyed:

Killed	8
Injured	60
Buildings Wrecked	85

(Not including Elgin.)

Killed.

Mrs. Thayer—At Elgin.

Mr. Duenly—Near Montorville.

The Destruction of Elgin, Minn.

At 12:20 p. m. on the 21st., the cyclone struck Elgin, Wabasha Co., Minn., and within one minute there was scarcely anything left of what was a little village of 250 inhabitants. One lady, Mrs. Thayer, was killed and several others wounded. The damage will foot up very heavily. A number of miraculous escapes took place. Mrs. Townsend was in the third story of the building with her family, over rooms occupied by Mrs. Thayer, and was hemmed in by two stoves, but fortunately escaped with slight bruises. A number of people were hurt slightly by missiles. Trees were all torn up. A German blacksmith was working when the wind took the entire shop and carried it off, and no trace of the shop left. Richardson's store is still standing. The front and back of the building is all blown away. All the stores are almost a complete wreck. The hotel office of Safford's was carried away some distance, including Emanuel Wiel, all escaped by going down in the cellar. The hardware store, saloon and agricultural store were almost demolished. A number of horses were killed. Some had their legs broken. Some dwellings were blown entirely away, nothing left to show except a few boards.

Fond du Lac, Wis., Badly Flooded.

A special of the 22d says: At intervals during the entire week Fond du Lac has been visited by the most terrific rainstorms, accompanied by heavy wind. Last night about 10:30 the heavens seemed to open and a deluge of rain fell, sweeping all light material before it. This was kept up a good share of the night, and at the dawn of morning everybody was of the opinion that a heavy rain had prevailed. They little knew what was in store for them. The usual large number of people wended their way to church, little dreaming that before return their homes would be flooded and carpets and furniture ruined; but such was the case. At about 11 a. m. several dams on Geneva creek gave way and the vast quantity of water which was thus confined swept the entire eastern portion of the city. The rear of the water, as it rushed along, receiving reinforcements at every foot, could be heard over great portion of the city. Upward of 200 dwelling houses are submerged more or less, according to location. For two hours the water continued to rise until it was a depth of three feet in the middle of the streets. At this writing it is gradually receding. The water traveled with such velocity that it tore up the Division street pavement and the lower end of the street, and washed it away to a depth of several feet, and still it rains.

The Damages to Crops from Hail Storms.

Col. A. R. Kiefer, president of the German-Scandinavian Hail Insurance company, whose general office is located in St. Paul, says that thus far, about 100 individuals had reported damages from storms, and these reports covered Minnesota, Dakota and portions of Wisconsin and Iowa. The first lost reported was on June 11 in Monroe county, Wis., and from that to July 12 the damage was very slight. The heaviest loss and damage occurred in the storm of July 15 and 16, which struck Lac Qui Parle county on the 15th inst., and Dunn county, Wis., the following day, July 16. In the former county nineteen losses were reported destroying one-half the crop, and in Dunn county, Wis. thirteen losses were reported, mostly to the tobacco crop. There the loss was also about one-half. Storms have been also reported in Lyon, Pipestone, Pope and Brown counties in Minnesota and from Manitowoc and Marquette counties, Wis., where the damage has been from 1-8 to 1-4 per cent of the crops. All these storms have been local in character, and to a large extent are confined to a few individuals. The reports to the company are up to the 19th inst., and as they come from all portions of the Northwest, it is safe to say that no widespread or serious damage had occurred to the crops at that date, whatever may have been the damage by the storm of the 21st.

Texan Nupitals Not Yearned For.

San Antonio Special: Paul Mortinez and a party, supposed to be his brother, drove up to San Pedro park Thursday evening, and informed Fritz Steinberger that some ladies in a carriage some little distance from the saloon wanted to see him. Upon reaching the vehicle, Mortinez and other party drew pistols and insisted that Steinberger should enter the carriage. This he refused to do, when he was shot at by one of the parties. He broke for the timber, but was overtaken by the brothers, who drove him to his family residence, where he was forced to marry Miss Alice Mortinez, whom they say had been seduced by Steinburgr. The county judge tied the knot, and at the close of the ceremony Paul Mortinez was arrested and lodged in jail. The bride and her sister accompanied Steinberger to the station, where the groom lodged a charge of assault with intent to murder against the brother.

The Great Telegraph Strike.

Last March a meeting was held at Chicago of representatives of several thousand operators of the Western Union telegraph lines, at which a request was made for shortening the hours of labor from nine to eight hours, and for an advance in wages. The officers of the Western Union declined to accede to the request and a general strike was determined upon. At a given signal Thursday noon, several thousand operators, all over the country, left their instruments. The immediate effects of the movement are not so palpable as might have been expected. The strike extended only to the employes of the Western Union company, and does not effect the railroads nor the larger newspapers, which have their own wires and employ their own operators.

In New York, a Frank Phillips, of the cable department, by a preconcerted agreement jumped on an operating table and blew a shrill, loud blast upon a large ivory whistle. Nearly 500 operators in the room, with the exception of a comparatively few, jumped to their feet simultaneously, and mounting chairs and tables, gave three deafening hurrahs that were heard for blocks. The grabbing of hats, coats and walking-sticks was next in order, and 400 operators, in dignified squads and batches filed down the steps.

The effect of the strike on the exchanges was electric. Within five minutes all the offices in the vicinity of the cotton, produce, petroleum, stock, and metal exchanges were thronged with persons, vainly trying to transmit messages. The messages were taken till the operators rose from their places. The signal was given by the chief operator in each office, who used the sounding board. In each case he led the operators out of the office. When the men left the man in charge of the office announced that no messages would be received. Similar scenes were witnessed in all the larger offices of the country. Immediately before the strike a rumor was sent all over the country that Gen. Grant had dropped dead in Wall street and as no contradiction came for some time, this was considered as the preconcerted signal for the strike, but such was not the fact.

It is said that 10,000 operators were engaged in the strike, most of them the most skilful of this profession. But a sufficient number remain to transmit the most important business, and it is probable that a compromise of some sort will soon solve the difficulty. The railroad lines employing their own operators were not seriously affected by the strike.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

The president has designated Z. B. Vance son of Senator Vance of North Carolina; Charles D. Clay of Kentucky, grandson of Henry Clay; and J. Harry Duva of Pennsylvania, to appear before the board of Fortress Monroe, Oct. 1, for examination for second lieutenancies in the army. This, with twelve designations from civil life formerly made, will, if the examination is successfully passed, fill all the vacancies in the army up to July 1. In case these young men fail to pass examination, other designations will be made by the president.

Washington Letter: Mahone of Virginia has a book which is almost as important to him as his pocket-book. It is expensively but substantially bound, carefully arranged and clearly printed. It contains a complete list of Virginians in office. Opposite each name is a little description, the principle feature of which is a definition of the employe's political position. This man is set down a bourbon republican, that a bourbon democrat, and the one at the head of the next page as a readjuster.

Cyrus Frisbie of Hot Springs is the lowest bidder for the building of the government army and navy hospital at Hot Springs, Ark. His figure was $86,335, when the quartermaster general says the cost cannot be less than $100,000.

Ninety thousand small envelopes, to be used for inclosing the ballots to be ready for the August election in Utah, are being mailed by Commissioner Clark to various parts of the Territory.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

Work upon the Northern Pacific is rapidly progressing. It is expected that the track layers will cross the Blackfoot sometime in a few days. Beyond that track will be laid at the rate of two and one-half miles a day. The junction will be made between Sept. 1 and 3 at the mouth of the Little Blackfoot river, where the Utah Northern intersects the Northern Pacific.

The earnings of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road for the second week in July were $412,000, against $332,000 for the corresponding time in 1882, an increase of $80,000.

GENERAL NEWS NOTES.

Miss Bridget Fox, an aged Irish woman, has for many years lived alone at Burlington, Iowa, in a one-story house, built with only one window which was covered with iron bars. The door was sheathed with the same material. She was known to possess considerable money and to be afraid to deposit or loan it. As she stepped into her yard on the morning of the 18th a young man knocked her down by a blow in the face. Another man quickly ripped open the waist of her dress and secured rolls of bills aggregating $1,500. The men escaped.

A special dispatch from Dallas, Tex., says: Peter Wright, twenty years old, and Ada Mays, thirteen years old, started out on the evening of the 15th, ostensibly to attend church. They returned on the morning of the 22nd, having been married in Atoka, Indian Territory. The parents of the girl haye concluded to accept the situation and withdraw the charge of abduction which they had entered against Wright.

On the 18th., the custom-house officers in New York seized in the mails one meerschaum pipe and cigar-holder, 148 gold rings, 19 brooches, 14 pairs of ear-rings, and a large quantity of lace, edging, collars and cuffs, and silk handkerchiefs.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

Frank Jackson, a negro laborer on the farm of Joseph Schaefer, a German living a short distance from St. Louis, was arrested for debauching two little girls belonging to Schaefer, aged respectively twelve and thirteen years. Jackson is forty years old and has a wife and family. He confessed to the charge, and said he had been intimate with the children nearly two years. The affair has created a good deal of excitement.

Mrs. W. D. Keys, a lady of high social standing in New Albany, Ind., has deserted her husband and four children and eloped with a policeman named Blessing, who leaves a good wife behind. It is charitably explained that Mrs. Keys' action is due to insanity.

PERSONAL PARAGRAPHS.

Cincinnati Special: Prof. John A. Warder, the most noted naturalist and horticulturalist in the United States, who died on the 13th, at North Bend, Ind., was buried in Spring Grove cemetery, in Cincinnati, at 3 o'clock on the 14th. Attending the funeral were features of a decidedly sensational character. The two sons of the deceased attempted to have made for their father a slab coffin so that the earth would come in contact with the body directly and cause it to decay immediately. The undertaker refused to make such a coffin, and then the commonest kind of a coffin such as paupers are buried in, was used. The sons wanted the burial performed at midnight, and they had it as near that unseasonable hour as they could under the circumstances. The coffin was hauled to the cemetery in a wagon and nobody but the two sons and the undertaker attended the burial. They rode in the same wagon that conveyed the corpse. No services of any kind were held and the noble gentleman was dumped into the ground as though he had died of small pox.

K. Stevens, Esq., of Saginaw, Mich., writes Mr. H. H. Young, secretary of the state board of immigration, that a party of about twenty gentlemen of that city propose to take a sixty days excursion into Minnesota this season with a view to shooting, fishing and prospecting.

FOREIGN NEWS GOSSIP.

The whereabouts of both the Carey's is well concealed by the government. It is said that these men are so utterly detested and pursued that they have agreed to undertake complete loss of identity and absolute exit, and it is understood that the government has arranged to manage their disappearance so that the great majority of even the very best informed officials will never know what becomes of them. The reports purporting to give exact information about either of the Careys may be set down as reports put out by the officials for the purpose of confusing the trial.

The report made by De Lesseps at the meeting at Paris of the Panama canal shareholder says: The co-operation of American contractors has dissipated the prejudices existing in certain centers of the United States against his company constructing the canal. The sentiment of equity prevailing among the Americans causes them to recognize that those who have undertaken the great work of building a canal across the isthmus have no object in view but the removal of a material obstacle to beneficial intercourse.

The executive council of New South Wales has forwarded a memorial to Earl Derby, secretary for the colonies, urging the government to reconsider its decision to forbid the annexation of New Guinea to Queensland, and inviting them to take steps to provide a federal government for Australia.

A proclamation will soon be issued by the dominion government regarding the quarantine of vessels from the Mediterranean coming to Canadian ports. This is rendered necessary on account of the spread of cholera in Egyptian ports.

A grand fete was given in London recently, in support of the fisheries exhibition aid fund, for building an English church at Berlin. The wife of Minister Lowell presided, and the prince and princess of Wales were present.

It is settled that Father Hyacinthe will come to America. He has purchased his tickets, will sail from France in the Arizona during the latter part of next month, and will land in New York about Sept. 1.

THE CASUALTY RECORD.

A Brooklyn dock was the scene on the 19th of a large fire, involving a heavy loss of property, and the death and maiming of a number of persons. A spark set fire to a pile of jute that was being landed from a Calcutta ship, and in a few moments the whole dock was in flames. The fire spread rapidly to the shipping in the vicinity, and everything seemed to burn like tinder. Several persons were drowned while trying to escape, and others were burned and bruised by the sudden falling of an adjacent storing shed. Estimates of the loss vary from $1,000,000 to $3,000,000.

Johnny, a five-year old son of Mr. Meisch living two miles above Rollingstone, Minn., had both legs cut off at the ankles by a reaper Saturday afternoon. It seems a playmate some nine years old was running into the standing rye, and little Johnny of course followed. His father, owing to the recent rain was walking and driving, and at the time the sad accident happened was going down hill. His father saw him, but could not stop the machine in time to save him.

A Minnesota Lunatic Throws Himself Into a Furnace.

Rochester (Minn.) Special: On the morning of the 21st inst., as the inmates of the hospital for the insane were being taken out to labor in the field, Charles Furhman, a patient, contrived to escape the eye of the attendant and found his way into the boiler room. The fireman not suspecting him to be a patient, paid but little attention to him and presently went into the next room, leaving the stranger by the furnace door. He returned and requested him to close it. Furhman instantly stooped, sprang headlong through the opening, which is about eighteen inches square, crawled into the upright boiler over the hot grates, and finally rose erect with his back against the glowing brick wall. Help was immediately summoned, but in a moment the poor fellow fell forward, literally baked by the intense heat. When his lifeless body was dragged forth a minute later every vestige of hair and clothing had disappeared. Coroner Mosse and Capt. M. J. Daniels, the resident trustee, were immediately summoned, but after having seen the remains and learning the facts, they decided that no inquest was necessary. Furhman was fifty-two years old. He was committed to the asylum last January, and his insanity was of a mild type. His friends live at West Albany, Wabasha county.

Accident to Chief Justice Waite.

Livingston, Mont., Special—A party consisting of Gen. A. H. Terry, Senator Edmunds, Chief Justice Waite, Lieut. Arthur and Surgeon J. C. McGuire, who were horseback riding in the National park around Mount Washburn when the pony ridden by Chief Justice Waite, annoyed by the loosening of the saddle girth, bucked and threw the rider to the ground, striking on his side and injuring his rib. The army surgeon thought, after examination, that no rib had been fractured. Another physician from Salt Lake who happened with the party thought differently. The chief justice seemed to suffer little inconvenience from it while there. A special car was sent down to the end of the Park Branch track and brought the party to Livingston. Chief Justice Waite will not go on with the party, but will return east, and it is understood that Gen. Terry will accompany him.

A Political Damon and Pythias.

Washington Correspondence Boston Herald.

The warm friendship which exists between General M. C. Butler, senator from South Carolina, and Don Cameron is well known in Washington. The Southern senator had until the recent lease of Cameron's elegant house a suite of rooms in it, which were as much his as if he, instead of Cameron, owned the house. The republicans have wondered at this intimacy, but not nearly so much as have the democrats. The republicans, however, are ready to bless the tie that binds, whatever it is, because it secures them from any political loss in the senate through Cameron's absence in Europe. It is known, whether that absence be long or short, that on all political subjects Butler is paired with Cameron. Some of the democratic magnates have remonstrated with Butler, telling him it is bad politics to make such indefinite pairs, but he replies that Don may stay as long as he likes and be sure that his pair is all right. Senator Butler doubtless reminds himself that if Don Cameron had so willed it Senator Hampton would have had a republican colleague all these six years.

Arrested a Minneapolis Embezzler.

St. Louis Special: The police have for some time been looking for Mike Honey, and their search was rewarded with success at 7 p. m. July 23, by his capture. Honey is wanted for several crimes, but the principal one is the theft or embezzlement of $7,000 from C. Altman & Co. of Minneapolis, for which firm he was bookkeeper. Last September he fled to Nashville, Tenn., leaving a wife and property at Minneapolis. At Nashville he cut a wide swath, winding up by marrying a young girl. With his new wife he came to St. Louis a week ago, he was traced, and was found clerking for the Natchez railroad. He was arrested and taken to the station on Chestnut street, and started for Minneapolis on the 8 o'clock train. He is a handsome young fellow a stylish dresser, and of a very erect and commanding carriage. He is an expert bookkeeper and accountant, and his social faculties made him envied in the office by his fellow clerks. His second wife left here was in a delicate condition.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

Minnesota Editorial Convention.

The sixteenth annual convention of t Minnesota Editorial association was held i the state capitol at St. Paul on the 18th inst. There was an unusually large attendance. The president, Mr. B. B. Herbert, called the convention to order and under the existing order of business, after B. C. Sanbor was appointed secretary pro tem., delivered his annual address, which was a very careful review of the organization from its inception through the various phases o the existence up to the present date. Gov. Hubbard then delivered an address o welcome in which he claimed to be a member of the fraternity as he was an edito and proprietor of a newspaper twenty year ago. Liberty Hall of the Glencoe Registe responded to the remarks of the governor. Papers were read upon a variety of topic and the following officers elected for th ensuing year:

President—B. B. Herbert, Red Wing.

Vice Presidents—Liberty Hall, Glencoe S Listoe, Fergus Falls; C. J. Coghland, Lac qui Parle.

Secretary—T. T. Bachelor, Minneapolis

The Successful Man.

When the successful man was a boy, a lived in a manufacturing village of Ne Hampshire, a widow's son, the greatest lu ury he knew was to eat apples, so he to us the other day when we fell into conve sation about old times.

"Yes," said he, "when I was ten yea old, I used to think that if ever I was ri enough to have as many apples as I wan ed, all the year round, I should be perfec ly happy. And now!"

He went on to say that he had one of t finest orchards, on a small scale, to found anywhere in Massachusetts, whi produced last year ninety-four barrels apples of the best varieties yet produce But he did not eat two apples per annu He could not; for while he was making fortune he worked so hard, and confin himself so closely, as to contract a chron weakness of digestion. With all the luxu ies at his command, he was obliged to li principally on oatmeal and milk.

Later in his youth his ambition soar above apples. He was begi ning to get a little more money th he absolutely needed, and able occasionally to indulge in a ride. then thought that if he ever owned a hor fast enough to pass everything on the roa and take no man's dust, he should be t proudest and happiest of men.

"Well," he continued, "I have a ho that I think is the fastest in the coun but I never drive him. I gave him to son last summer, and for my own us keep an old plug that jogs along six mi an hour, without troubling myself abo him."

At this point our poor successful m wearily took out his watch to see how ti was getting on and we observed that t watch was a peculiar pattern rarely seen this country.

"This watch," said he, "is another case point. One of my young ambitions was possess as good a watch as mortal man cou make. I have one. I gave $600 in gold f it at a time when gold was a more expensi article than it is now. But knocking abo the world in sleeping cars and Mediterr nean steamboats I was always a little an ious about my watch, and, besides, the p session of so costly an article by a trave is a temptation to robbers. One day Paris I noticed this curious little w marked twenty-five francs. A $5 w was a novelty, and I bought it. I dep my $600 timekeeper with my banke it has been there ever since in an ir I find this little watch keeps time for all the ordinary purposes of lif other, and I have carried it ever since."

The successful man said these things w what we may call good-humored desp He made no complaint, but at the age w he ought to be at the full tide of chee activity, he appeared to have exhau life.

The Wheat Question.

SOMETHING FOR THE FARMERS OF MINNESOTA TO THINK OF.

Do They Want Good Prices for Their Wheat, or Poor Ones?

The Question Practically Considered.

From the Duluth Tribune.

We have already called attention to the alarm felt in Minneapolis over the growing importance of the wheat market of Duluth. A great deal has been said in the Millers' Association meetings on this point, but not until the past week were they indiscreet enough and frank enough to put it in print; and, while the newspaper reporter elaborated the idea, the gist of the whole matter was contained in his quotation from the words of a leading miller:

"The time has gone by when sales of a few thousand bushels would break the Duluth market, and the sooner our brokers and millers learn the Duluth catechism and take action which will prevent the building up there of a dangerous competing market, the better it will be for Minneapolis. I am not an alarmist, but have watched this matter for a long time. I now find so many others who agree with me as to the outlook that I think the press should sound a note of warning. Members of the chamber of commerce have the power to keep Duluth's competition within safe limits. It is not desirable to crush it entirely, but they can go father and accomplish this if they desire to do so."

This is a matter that is of interest to more people than those at Duluth. All the farmers of Minnesota, Dakota, and all the citizens of that territory who are not running flour mills, but who wants their country prosperous, and want a high price for wheat to continue, in order that their country may be and remain prosperous, are directly and vitally interested in this question.

Duluth is called a "dangerous competing market." Why so? Because in it wheat brings a high price; and therefore the Minneapolis millers propose to extinguish it! we do not believe it will take a very loud appeal to wake up the entire stretch of prairie from Lake Superior to the Yellowstone valley on this question. Our indiscreet friend says:

"Members of the [Minneapolis] Chamber of Commerce have the power to keep Duluth's competition within safe limits."

"Within safe limits" (for the millers of Minneapolis) is good, but now we wish to ask what that power is. Apparently it is only to control the railroads and have established a HIGHER RATE OF FREIGHT TO DULUTH!

This will, of course, depress the prices obtained by the farmers at their country stations, and enable the Minneapolis millers to buy their wheat cheap, and thus make more money, and this increase freight rates to Duluth, seems the only possible way to accomplish the desired end.

But will the railroads do this? Will the people stand it? What do you say, brethren of the country press out on the broad prairies of Minnesota and Dakota? We would like to hear from all of you on the subject, and see what you think of it; and we hope that the railroads will be forced to dec'are their intentions in this matter very soon.

Of one thing we are very certain, and that is that if the railroads are to protect the millers at the expense of the farmers, the next Minnesota legislature will be elected on that issue, and we shall see "Granger Legislation" again, with some vengeance thrown in.

The interest that Duluth has in this matter is, of course, very great; but is not nearly so great as the interest of all Minnesota and Dakota, outside of Minneapolis.

What we have to say in relation to the above is simply that the farmers throughout the Great Northwest must either obtain all the eastern markets will allow for their wheat or else they must quit raising wheat. We have, time and again in these columns, shown that our farmers were receiving from ten to fifteen cents less per bushel for their wheat in the Minneapolis market than they could secure in the Duluth market if they could get their wheat there by a railroad direct. The relief we sought we thought would be found in the building of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad, which would afford a short line to water transportation, thus affording a larger margin of profit for the farmer who now sends his wheat to Minneapol's, thence by all rail to eastern markets. There is another principle involved and it is found in this old and true saying: "Competition is the life of trade." While we have only one market to depend upon it is and always will be a fact that we must pay a very large margin for speculation. It has been said by some (probably in the interest of wheat-buyers) that wheat can be raised at a profit for from 70 to 75 cents per bushel, and this is urged as a reason why farmers should not receive more for their wheat. Now, this may be true upon large farms embracing thousands of acres under one management, where machinery, provisions and supplies of all kinds are bought at wholesale and shipped in (but we doubt it even in those cases) but, for the average farmer, one who has to depend upon getting all his supplies in this country, who trades wholly on time, who pays ten per cent interest on every little accommodation he gets and sometimes more, who pays from $400 to $600 per pair for his horses, and proportionately for oxen this rule will not apply by any means. In order to make his business of farming pay an equal dividend with every other business of the country he must raise at least 20 bushels of wheat to the acre and get one dollar per bushel for it. We cite the relative conditions of business men and farmers to prove this assertion. Oh, but it is said, the farmer must learn to economise in his living, he must go without needed machinery, without needed help, must scrimp his wife and children, deny them the necessaries of life then he can pay his debts and make money! If such is the case then we say decidedly there is no money in farming, for no other business men in the Northwest thinks that he must deny himself and family any little luxury in order to just pull through by the skin of his teeth. The farming business ought to pay largely in this Northwest and if it does not there is an African in the brush pile somewhere. We think there is, and we think it is in the fact that farmers do not begin to get all there is in their wheat for their labor. We are glad this subject is being aired and we expect to see it result in great good to the Northwest as a whole.

Red River Valley Farms.

Grand Forks Herald: There is no better or safer investment for capital to-day, than in the rich farming lands of the Red River Valley. Persons who have lived here for years fail to realize the value of these lands, until they visit the east or west and compare these broad and fertile acres with the lighter soils and frequent unfavorable seasons there found. A Herald representative recently visited Bismarck (half the size of Grand Forks) and found farming lands five miles from the city held at $15 to $25 per acre, and similar prices rule near Jamestown. No intelligent person who has any regard for truth-telling, will pretend to assert that the lands of the James or Missouri River Valleys are as rich and productive as those of the Red River Valley. They are not as well able to withstand the extremes of weather, and will not oftener than one year in ten, with the same care and cultivation, yield as many bushels of grain per acre. Within five miles of Grand Forks choice quarter sections of land can be purchased as low as $1,500, and investments at those prices are as sure to yield a profit as is interest to accumulate on government bonds. There is not an acre of land in the Red River valley that will not at some day, not very distant, in the future, sell quickly at $50 cash. The intrinsic value and unlimited productiveness of Red River Valley soil is but half appreciated. There may be now and then a year of "hard times" here as everywhere, but he who owns a Red River Valley farm and cultivates or holds it for an advance in price, has a sure source of income and is as rich as though he had much money in the bank.

What Plants Get From the Soil.

In speaking of the composition and growth of plants a writer in the Farmer's Review says.

All portions of field and garden crops come from the air and the soil. The leading food element furnished by the air is carbon. This substance is very generally distributed throughout the plant in root, stem and leaf. It is the part that forms charcoal when a piece of wood is partly burned in a confined place.

Woody fibre is made up of these simple substances, namely: Carbon, hydrogen and oxygen. The last two named elements compose water, and in that substance is an abundant supply. It is not necessary for us to discover the source of the water, it comes to the soil in rain (or snow) and is taken into the plant through the roots. For our purpose it is safe to say that the soil furnishes the necessary hydrogen and oxgen of all agricultural plants. The three food elements, thus far mentioned, make up the great part of all plant structures. If we take a potato or a turnip and remove all the carbon, hydrogen and oxygen in them there will be but a very small amount of substance left. But some of the other parts are just as necessary to the growth of the plant as the three already mentioned.

There is some potash needed, and this comes from the soil. In a wheat crop, something like thirty pounds of potash is found in the grain and wheat of an acre. The quantity is several hundred pounds on a large crop of beets of the same area. If a soil lacks potash in a soluble form it must be added to it. Though abounding in all other substances and lacking in this one, a soil will be barren. Most soils contain enough for a large number of crops, but it may be in a form so that it is out of reach of the plants. Tillage and exposure to the action of the air and rains will reduce this locked up potash to a soluble form. This may help to explain the value of fallowing and the good effect of plowing heavy clays in the fall, and leaving the bare, rough surface exposed to the elements.

Phosphoric acid is needed by all plants, in not far from the same amount as potash; it also is in the rocks and may need the plow and harrow to bring it out of the plant. This substance abounds in bones and on this account largely the bone meals, dirt, etc., are so valuable as a fertilizer. Potash is supplied in the form of German potash, salt and other forms, while phosphoric acid is applied in a concentrated form in all supherphosphates. A superphosphate is a substance in which the phosphoric acid has been made soluble in water by the action of some strong acid, sulphuric acid is generally employed.

The most difficult point in this subject is to that of the source of the nitrogen in plants. This element is needed by all crops in quantities from two to four times greater than either the potash or phosphoric acid. The atmosphere is made up three-fourths of this element, and yet it seems to not be available in its simple form as food in the air. It is necessary for the nitrogen to be in union with some other substance; that is, a compound of nitrogen is necessary to furnish a plant the nitrogen it needs. There are many of these, the most common of which are the nitrates and ammonia, both of these are found to a small extent in the air, and are washed down in every rain; after passing into the soil they are taken up by the roots and enter the plants in solution along with other substances that nourish vegetation. We see then that both the air and the soil feed the plants; above all the light of the sun is needed. We often overlook that which is above us and from which we get our greatest benefits.

Importance Of Roads.

We are not aware that any estimate has ever been made of the actual cost of the public roads of the United States, or that the expense of providing them has ever been attempted by any bureau of statistics, but we make the rough estimate that they have cost at lest seven hundred million dollars—probably much more—while unknown millions are annually expended in attempting to keep them in repair If the money were only well applied, it would be an expenditure of great profit and economy, as everything which the farmer does off his own land is greatly affected by their condition. All his many loads of surplus farm pro ducts are drawn over them, and it makes some difference to him and to his horses whether those loads are conveyed easily over hard, smooth surfaces, or dragged through mud and against stones with severe labor to the team, fatigue to the driver, and wear and breakage to the wagon. Every week he and his family, more or less, go to the village for numberless errands, or to church on the Sabbath, and the good or bad conditson of the roads seems to affect every fiber, pleasantly or unpleasantly, of their feeling or nervous sensations. On an average, there is at least twenty miles of traveling each week for the members of a single family. It would make a difference of five dollars a week, everything counted, whether this teaming and traveling is done over a nice, comfortable road or through mud holes, sloughs, ruts, and unbridged streams, or against stones. Five dollars a week amounts to $250 a year, a snug little sum to tax the farmer with; and when this sum is multiplied by at least five million owners or drivers of horses, carriages, wagons, heavy teams, etc., the aggregate cost would be something over a billion dollars! Does any one say this is too large an estimate? Then proceed in detail and show in what particulars; but do not blindly and ignorantly say it is wrong without careful examination Suppose, however, we admit that it is double the reality, is not the six hundred millions every year, expended directly or indirectly by our people, worthy of more attention on the part of patriots, statesmen, politicians, office seekers, public spirited men, writers for newspapers, agricultural journalists, and in fact of every one who passes over a road?—[County Gentleman.

Care of Young Chickens.

A Correspondent of the New-England Homestead gives her method of feeding to produce large, early-matured fowls:

The first three or four days I feed chickens on crackers and hard boiled eggs chopped very fine. One egg and two crackers is sufficient for a brood of 12 one day, provided the hen has whole grain constantly by her. For the next few days I give oatmeal slightly moistened, or baked Johnny cake and millet seed. When three weeks old I change to a mash of boiled potatoes, meal middlings and bran, a few beef scraps, a little bone meal and salt. I keep dry, cracked corn, wheat, oats, or whole corn, by them all the time. to pick at when they wish. After the first week I give some kind of green food, using turnips, potatoes, cabbage, etc., until a supply of winter rye, oats, or lettuce can be grown in boxes or cold frames. Until three weeks old I feed at least five times a day, the first and last meal as early and late as they can see to eat it. Success depends as much on frequent and regular feeding as on the quality of the food. Chickens fed in this way get a good start while young, and will lay two months earlier than if kept hanging between life and death on raw cornmeal dough thrown to them once or twice a day and left to become foul and sour. The extra cost and trouble is amply repaid in the greater per cent, raised, and earlier maturity of the chickens—[Country Gentleman.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELla Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagame, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagees, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 26th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 428 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100.) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars, ($558,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 7th day of September A. D. 1883, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 26

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Mr. J. Bischoff and Mr. Walters have each secured an organ of Mr. Dusso, of Crookston.

Last Friday this portion at least of the great wheat belt was blessed by a most copious and refreshing rain, which will prove of inestimable value. Crops of every kind are already wonderfully beautified, and with reasonable good weather for a few weeks eastern Polk county will roll out a big crop of No 1 hard.

Gentlemen who have carefully examined the crops around Red Lake Falls and between this place and Crookston assure us that the prospect is magnificent. It has been retarded somewhat by the late dry spell, but the rains of the past week have wonderfully improved it, and nothing stands in the way of an enormous crop of No 1 hard, but possible unfavorable weather at harvest.

St. Hilaire Packet.

From the Spectator

New potatoes, green peas, strawberries etc. are being brought into town by our farmers, and are finding a ready sale.

Mrs. Ritchie, of Winona, mother of Mr. S. W. Ritchie, and Mrs. Hanscome mother of Mrs. S. W. Ritchie, are visiting in these parts.

Miss Van Wie left for a visit to Crookston on Monday last. She will return in a week and take charge of a new school which is to be started a few miles north of St. Hilaire.

A gentleman who has traveled over the country, says that the crops north of St. Hilaire look 20 per cent better than in any other part of the Valley. Bring on that elevator.

The first drive of logs for Crocker & Cundy arrived from Red Lake to-day, are being cared for by Bob Kennedy an old lumberman from Stillwater, who has been employed to oversee the drives. This lot consists of large oak, and pine logs and contains close on to 150,000 feet. C. & C. intend going to Minneapolis this week to make arrangements for a large saw mill which they intend bringing in here to convert these monsters of the forest into lumber.

Opportune indeed was the heavy rains which visited us the past week. Heavy dews which fell in this vicinity had kept the crops in good condition and the rain was all that was needed to produce a bountiful yield. The farmers all wear smiling faces, and say that the crops around St. Hilaire this year will far exceed anything we have yet had. Hay which is very poor in other parts of the country will be a fair crop here, and vegetables, although late, will be as plentiful as last year.

Fisher's Fancies

From the Bulletin.

The populace of District No. 11, in the town of Bygland, are to be congratulated for the building of a $790 school house in place of the one formerly used. Messrs. Armstrong & Ames, of Fisher, are the contractors and propose to have the same completed in a few weeks. Let others of the outlying districts follow up the good example, as nothing enhances the value of real estate so much as good schools.

Mr. John Fosberg, one of Crookston efficient artists, came up Thursday evening on a short visit, and also to furnish the necessary music for Fisher's beauxs and belles.

Iron is going down on the Moorhead Northern at the rate of a mile a day. All the timber prepared is stored near the commencement of the track for bridges, and the work is being pressed as rapidly as several hundred men can do it.

Messrs. Edwards & son, of the New Era machine, have orders to commence work with a large force of teams and a number of machines, for the speedy completion of the Manitoba railroad company's twenty-two mili big ditch, north of us.

David Morrow, residing south of Fisher, some six or eight miles, displayed a sample of wheat Friday, which shows the crops in this section to be but slightly damaged by the drouth. The specimen was taken at random without regard to quality, and gives promise of a yield of twenty-five bushels to the acre.

Intelligence was received yesterday morning that a dwelling house of one the farmers living west of Fisher on the Morais, had been struck by lightning and entirely consumed. Our informant was not acquainted with the facts, therefore no definite conclusions can be arrived at except as above stated.

One of our citizens brought into the Bulletin office last Tuesday as fine a specimen of wheat as has been our lot to see since residing in the Red River Valley. The stalks were produced upon the farm of John Peterson, some miles south of Fisher, and contained heads of wheat nearly six inches in length, the late rains having done wonders for the field. Mr. Peterson has a number of acres in as fine condition as the sample shown and attributes its thrift entirely to deep plowing, claiming that the late drouth has effected it but very little.

SAD OCCURRENCE.

Sudden death of L. L. Ramstad at His Residence Last Saturday.

From the Ada Index.

This community was greatly shocked last Saturday by the painful intelligence that Lars L. Ramstad had died at 12:30 of heart disease, at his residence in this city.

Lars L. Ramstad was born in the Kingdom of Norway, Dec. 4. 1846, and in the year 1863 emigrated to America and settled in Vernon Co., Wis., where he lived until 1871, when he removed to Becker county, Minn., and in 1877 came to Ada, and has since made it his home. He was married to Miss Helena Enockson on the 23d day of March, A. D., 1882 who now survives him. He also leaves a mother, father, two brothers and six sisters to mourn his loss.

The deceased was deservedly one of the most popular men in the county, and up to the time of his death had filled the position of postmaster. Previous to his illness, which misfortune overtook him about two years ago, he had been a very active business man. The winter of 1881-82 he spent at his parents' home in Wisconsin, for the benefit of his health, and last winter at Hot Springs, Ark. When the weather became warm this spring a decided improvement was noticed in his health and his many friends indulged in the hope that he would soon be recovered. But it was not to be and his death occured last Saturday, as stated. The funeral took place from the M. E. church last Sunday afternoon at 5 o'clock and was attended by a large gathering. Rev. W. J. Hunter conducted the services, ably assisted by the Rev. P. O. Stromme. The remains were taken to his old home in Wisconsin for burial, and were accompaied by the wife and sister of deceased and Messrs. A. H. Baker and L. S. Kolden. The bereaved family have the sincere sympathy of the entire community.

Camilla Urso.

Boston Daily Globe.

Camilla Urso drew a very large and appreciative audience last evening Always a favorite here, she was never more so than on this occasion, as the unmistakable genuineness of the tokens of appreciation thoroughly demonstrated. The selections were such as to do full justice to her remarkable powers as a violinist, which were never shown to better advantage before a Boston audience. The assisting artists, Mr. Hansen, Mr. Sonnekalb, and, last but far from least, Prof. Wm. Mason Evans, contributed greatly to the enjoyment of the evening. Score another success for the Star Course.

Buffalo County Journal: "August Walter, the Crookston brewer, was in town last week visiting friends. Years, years ago, August was an Alma boy. He married Miss Wohlwend, daughter of Martin Wohlwend, and removed to Red Wing, and from thence to Crookston, where he is in the brewing business and well to do. He looks very natural to his old friends here, only he has grown so. He casts a very large shadow now.

Ivy Poisioning.—The "Poison Ivy," also called "Poison Oak," and in some localities known as "Marcury," is often the cause of great distress. The vine is abundant all over the country, one from being low, running along on banks and rambling over stone walls. Another form climbs the highest trees, clinging to the bark by its many rootlets. It is often confunded with the Virginia Creeper; indeed, we have known it to be planted as an ornamental vine, it having been mistaken for that. The two are readily told apart, the Virginia Creeper having its dark-green, shiny leaves five-parted, while the light-green leaves of the poison vine are three-parted. The Poison Ivy is so very abundant, that were all equally susceptible to its influence, we should hear much more of its effects than we do at present. With many, the poison produces only a slight eruption on the skin and an intense itching. Others are more seriously affected, and the face swells up to such an extent that the features are hardly visible. Nearly every locality has its popular remedies for the poison, and new ones are frequently proposed. As a general thing, most cases are relived by keeping the bowels open by the use of salts, and washing the eruptions with a strong solution of sugar of lead. The latest remedy, which is now going the rounds, is to bathe the affected parts with lime water, applied as hot as it can be borne. This is simple, the remedy is usually at hand, and is worth trying, as other alkaline washes have been found useful. No harm can result. —American Agriculturist for August.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELLA Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagamie, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota:

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagees, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 26th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 426 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100,) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars, ($558,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 10th day of August A. D. 1883, at two o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

MORE BOSSISM.

Detroit Record.

How long the people of Becker county will submit to the dictation of Paul Sletten, of Crookston, the boss of political pap for this section is a question for them to decide. This paper has frequently stated its opinion that the people of this county were abundantly able to control their own affairs, and we are of the same opinion still. If Sletten would confine his operations to any moderate degree of decency, it might be tolerated in a measure, but when he sets himself up as the great "I am" in strictly county affairs it becomes a different matter, and he should be opposed by every man in Becker county who has a particle of manhood about him. The latest importation of Crookston bossism has come to light during the past week. M. E. Dahl, county treasurer, has been in failing health for some time, and decided to tender his resignation to the board of commissioners at their meeting next week, and go to Norway for the benefit of his health, and made known his intention. This would leave with the commissioners the responsibility of filling the vacancy, and several candidates, from various parts of the county, made their appearance. The matter has been thoroughly canvassed during the past week, and O. A. Boe, of Hamden, was the undisputed choice of a majority of the board. Word went forth to the boss, at Crookston, who bobbed up smiling and after a little secret pow-wow declared that the will of the people, as about to be expressed by their representatives, must be defeated, he being on unfriendly terms with Mr. Boe, and a little arrangement was concocted whereby Mr. Dahl will, while in a foreign land and with no intention of returning during the term for which he was elected, apparently continue in office, and T. G. Torgerson, of Cuba, will endeavor to assume the duties of treasurer. While Mr. Torgerson may be competent to fill the position, and while the county will have abundant security for moneys intrustee to his care, we are opposed to any such underhanded arrangement, especially when the job is put up by imported dictation from Polk county. We have always found in Mr. Dahl a gentlemanly and obliging official, and have none but well wishes for his future both in regard to health and fortune; but if he finds himself unable to attend to the duties of his office and is about to leave this country, he should not allow the will of the people to be circumvented through so obnoxious a source as that which is proposed. As between Mr. Boe and Mr. Torgerson personally, we have but little, if any, choice, and had the matter been left for settlement to the proper and legitimate authority, it would have mattered whichever way it was decided. But until Paul Sletten again becomes a resident of Becker county we do not propose to stand quietly by and witness his weilding of the cudgel over Becker county matters.

The above screed from the Detroit Record might lead the uninitiated to infer that there was a huge African in the fence somewhere, and perhaps a little light upon the subject might not be amiss. In the first place, it should be known that Paul Sletten has had the manliness to oppose the corrupt teachings of the Record from the very day of its birth, and not only himself, but the majority of the people of Becker County. The present owner of the Record is but new in the business, having assumed control but a few years since, but he has played to the tune of the old "bosses" of Becker County pretty well since he has had control, which suggests the idea that the old "bossism" in Becker County is not played out yet. If we had never lived in Becker County we might suspect, by the Record's account, that a large African existed in the wood-pile, but having lived there for a term of years, and long before the present Record man ever heard of the county, we are tolerably well posted in Becker County politics, and we can see the true inwardness of the above article at a glance. Years ago (probably before the present Record man was born) one Col. Geo. H. Johnson, a long-headed yankee from Boston, conceived the idea that the little spot of earth now known as Detroit, had the m-kin's of a mitey big city. Among other beats that he induced to settle there was the Detroit Record. Johnson soon became acquainted with the natives and in the same ratio as he became acquainted, the influence of the Record waned. This did not suit the ambitious "Colonel," and so the Record began to change hands, passing regularly through five or six changes until it reached its present boss, Mr. Hamilton. All the time it has kept up a steady fire against Mr. Sletten, who, by the way, has always had, and now has, a greater property interest at stake in Becker County than the whole kit and caboodle of the Record publishers from Col. Johnson down to the present incumbent; and this is the secret of the Record's screed that while Mr. Sletten lived in Becker County he, being in sympathy with a majority of the honest people of the county, found himself thus arrayed against the Record and its owners—a small clique who sought to run the affairs of the county, and also that Mr. Hamilton himself was an aspirant to the office of treasurer of that county. Self-interest and revenge—two pretty powerful allies generally. As to the article, all who know Mr. Ole A. Boe, laugh at it, for they know what kind of a hairpin he is. Even if Mr. Sletten had "interested himself in Becker County affairs," we claim that he had as perfect a right to do so as the editor of the Record, as he is a much larger property owner in Becker County to-day than the editor of the Record himself. The will of the people of Becker County has always beaten the Record the same as in this case, and the Record has always sought a scape-goat for its own shortcomings just the same as in this case, and it generally succeeds in lighting upon the man of whom it is the most afraid. The Record does not say that Boe was the candidate of the Corbin Banking Co., for treasurer, but we will bet a big apple that, had Boe been appointed, instead of Torgerson, E. G. Holmes and the Corbin Banking Co. would have had things pretty much their own way during Boe's administration. In talking about "bossism" the Record should not forget to mention those who have labored so earnestly to get there, as it is altogether too great a slight to its own friends.

Mr. G. S. Barnes, the well known Northern Pacific elevator man, said to r reporter: "You know what my views were three weeks since. To-day I am prepared to say that I would not have believed it possible under any conditions whatever for the grain crop to make such a rally, and so completely change its appearance and promise, as our northwestern crop has done during the last twenty days. The transformation is simply amazing, and my estimate of results at the harvest must be correspondingly changed. In a word, taking a belt of country with which I am personally most familiar, namely, that along the main line and branches of the Northern Pacific railroad, I now feel perfectly certain that the crop of 1883 will show a better average, acre for acre, than that of last year, and I have no doubt that the increase of acreage sown is over twenty per cent. over that of last season. You can readily infer from this that our country is going to have one-fifth more of good grain to sell this year than last. This means a good goal in many sections, and I do not believe that anything will occur between now and the actual harvest to reduce my estimates. On the other hand, the situation is improving with every day of the present weather.—[Minneapolis Evening Journol.

Farm Notes.

Minnesota Tribune.

WHEN TO CUT WHEAT.

There are many different opinions as to the exact time wheat should be cut in order to make good weight and at the same time to yield the most flour. We have experimented a good deal in this matter, and have always found that the best time to cut wheat is before the berry hardens, when the kernel will leave no moisture when crushed. Wheat cut at that period will weigh more to the bushel, the kernels are more plump and the flour is of a much superior quality and more of it than if made from wheat that was not harvested until after it had fully matured. Wheat that is cut early may perhaps shrink in the stook, but when stacked—it will go through the process of "a sweat," and after it has been stacked for four weeks, it will be found to be as bright and as plump as need be—more so, than the grain that is cut when it has become fully ripe. As previously stated, the quality of the flour will be much better, and much more of it from the same quantity of grain can be made, than from late cut wheat. We know this is so, because we have faithfully tried it. It pays to cut wheat early, and it pays to stack it before it is threshed, though some of the large farmers who have several hundred or thousands of acres usually thresh out their wheat from the shocks; but they always haul it to market at once. When wheat is threshed from the stooks or shocks, it should not be cut until pretty nearly matured, because if cut at an earlier period it will be liable to shrink in the shock' hence the grade will be lessened and it will not bring so much in market as plump wheat. Wheat is bound to go through what is called the heating process, that is, if it is not permitted to sweat in the stack, it will sweat in the bin, and it is much better to choose the former. Again, the straw from early cut wheat is worth double that which is not cut until it is dead ripe, when it has parted with all its juices and left nothing but woody fibre for the stock to feed upon, instead of nutritious animal food. Another advantage is that harvesting can be commenced a week sooner than it can be if left until the grain is hard before the sickle is put in motion. This means a week earlier for the fall plow, which is a matter of a food deal of moment for our western farmers, because every farmer knows the advantage of early plowing in the fall. A good deal of the foul seed of the land will sprout and grow which will be killed by the frost, thus ridding the land of weeds.

THE FRUIT PROSPECTS.

We have a good deal of correspondence from different parts of the North west in regard to the present indications of the fruit crop this year. We are led to believe that the yield of apples will be fully an average one, but not so in relation to plums. The tame varieties have made a poor stand, while the wild ones will fall short of an average yield. Cranberries, which are raised in large quantities in several portions of Wisconsin and Minnesota, will be only a fair crop. Grapes are coming on finely. Thus far they are free from mildew, and it is believed the yield will be large. On the whole, the reports are encouraging for a moderate average fruit crop this fall.

CHEAP LANDS.

We find in the eastern papers that Hon. John I. Morrill, of Gilford, N. H., recently purchased, for $2,50 per acre 1100 acres of land, in the old Granite state, that 40 years ago made up 10 farms, and was valued at $40 per acre. This is a striking commentary on the decay of agriculture in New England, that causes painful feelings and sorrow to many a western man, in whose veins New England blood flows. It would seem that the life and vitality of some portions of New England had been transferred to the west. We have no doubt but these same 10 farms of yore produced some of the best men and women that now occupy flourishing western homes.

MOISTURE IN DEEP PLOWING.

We wish to impress upon the farmers in the Red River valley the necessity of deep plowing. We learn from J. C. Benson of Fargo, the general agent of the recently patented steam plow, that even on the celebrated wheat farms in the Red River valley the plowing as a general rule is shallow. The effect of shallow plowing must be visible to the farmers during dry seasons. There is always moisture in deep plowing. In 1863 we knew of farmers who raised good crops of wheat in Olmstead county Minn., with-out any rain of moment from the time wheat was put into the ground until it was harvested. These farmers plowed there land deep. There was no danger of the surface drying up. We would rather have a subsoil plow follow the common plow in the Red River valley, if the latter was not capable of plowing eight or 10 inches deep. We believe in most years there is sufficient humidity in the atmosphere to mature crops in that rich and fertile region, but they are liable to have an occasional dry season, just the same as all other parts of the world are, and when it does come it will be found that that their crops on the shallow plowing will be a failure. In any event, there can be no question but what every variety of grain will produce a much larger crop, either in a wet or dry season, when sown on land that is plowed deep. Possibly, in an unusually wet seasen there might be danger that the crop would be too heavy and liable to lodge, but we should be willing to take our chances on that contingency rather than to be certain of a failure in dry seasons.

Spend Money Wisely.

Do farmers, any of us, spend our time as we ought to. Something to eat is the first consideration of all of us. The next thing is something costly to eat. Trading is our paradise. For our oats and barley, corn and potatoes, we must have our tea, coffee, sugar, tobacco, beer and whisky. Most of us omit the whisky and beer; but it safe to say that on an average we spend annually fifty dollars in a manner that is a disgrace to us. How about those costly photograph albums, carpets and cabinets, newspapers, magazines, musical instruments, singing and music books, instruction to old and young in music and drawing? No debts to muddle the brain; no over-work to palsy the limbs. Not a day but he sends a letter to the post-office to friends, relations, editors or nursery-men. Every spring setting out trees. Every winter with more of a shelter belt. No insects as a consequence of tilling the land to death. The breed of our stock improving. Every year better able to hide our bad luck. Living in such a manner as to benefit the near neighbor and the most distant foreigner. Let us overcome isolation by making the old homestead attractive.—[Farmers' Review.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Polk. } ss. In Probate Court, Special Term, July 27, 1883.

In the matter of the estate of John W. Farrel deceased.

On reading and filing the petition of John G. Farrel administrator of the estate of John W. Farrel, deceased, representing among other things, that he has fully administered said estate, and praying that a time and place be fixed for examining and allowing his account of his administration, and for the assignment of the residue of said estate to heirs.

It is ordered, that said account be examined, and petition heard, by the Judge of this Court, on Monday the third day of September A. D., 1883, at 2 o'clock p. m., at his office at the city of Crookston in said county.

And it is further ordered, that notice thereof be given to all persons interested, by publishing a copy of this order for three successive weeks prior to said day of hearing, in the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL a weekly newspaper, printed and published at Crookston, Minn., in said county.

Dated at Crookston, the 27th, day of July A. D. 1883.

By the Court,
ROBERT J. MONTAGUE,
Judge of Probate.

Mortgage Sale.

WHEREAS, FRANK DARWIN AND STELla Darwin, his wife, as mortgagors, did, on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, duly execute and deliver to Henry Hammel, of Outagamie, Wisconsin, as mortgagee, their mortgage bearing date the 25th day of April, A. D. 1882, whereby they mortgaged to said mortgagee the following described lands situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota.

Northwest quarter (¼) of Section six (6) Township one hundred and fifty (150) Range forty-five (45) containing 167 acres, according to the U. S. government survey thereof, be the same more or less, to secure the payment of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent per annum according to the conditions of two certain promissory notes of even date with said mortgage, executed by Frank Darwin the first named of the said mortgagees, of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) each, the first of said notes due seven months after the date thereof and the other of said notes due in eighteen months from the date thereof, which said mortgage was on the 25th day of April A. D. 1882, duly recorded in the in the office of the Register of Deeds for said County of Polk in book "G" of mortgages on pages 428 and 429, and whereas, default has been made in the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250) principal and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents (58c) interest on the first described note, in all the sum of two hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-eight cents ($262 58-100.) due on the 25th day of November, A. D 1882, and the said sum due as principal and interest on said note is still unpaid and due, and whereas it was stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to said mortgage that if default should be made in the conditions or covenants therein contained on the part of the said mortgagor to be kept and performed, that then and and from thenceforth, it should be lawful for said mortgagee, his heirs or assigns, to consider the whole sum thereby secured as immediately due and payable, and whereas the said mortgagee has exercised his option to consider and declare, and do hereby declare the whole sum of money secured by said mortgage to be due and payable, and whereas there is now due and claimed to be due upon the said mortgage at the date of this notice the sum of five hundred and fifty-eight dollars ($558,) and no action or proceeding either at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, by a sale of the lands and premises described in and covered by the said mortgage, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the Post office, in the city of Crookston, in said county, on the 7th day of September A. D. 1883, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of said day at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, to pay the sum due on said mortgage, together with the taxes if any on said premises and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees therein stipulated to be paid in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated June 27th, A. D. 1883.

Mrs. I. Brin expects to leave for a visit east in a few days.

E. D. Childs has built a large granary on Sec. 3 in Fairfax.

You can now cross to Sampson's Addition via the dam dry shod.

Express agent Dyer has indulged in a fine coat of paint for his wagon.

Ed Schrader has sold his trotter, Crookston Pet, to Joe St. Germain for $600.

Henry Lewis went to St. Paul on Monday night. Expects to travel on the road.

Ole Rudi is going to try for a deep well on his farm on Section 10, in Fairfax.

Wm. Marin on Wednesday completed four miles of road in just eight days time. It is a good road bed too.

McKinnon Bros., sold $2000 worth of twine on Wednesday. That dont look as though there was no wheat to cut.

R. W. Ranney, the Glyndon well-digger took a run up yesterday to see how things were progressing in Polk County.

The remains of the late W. J. Newton were brought to this city on Tuesday and laid away to rest in the new cemetery.

Conductor Alexander and wife have returned from their visit east. They brought Mr. A. L. Lindsley with them for a visit.

At the council meeting on Tuesday evening it was decided to purchase another hose cart and 500 feet of hose. Good scheme.

A board screen has been placed in the canal at the pump house to prevent small bits of wood and trash getting into the wheels.

The two graders in Fairfax are doing excellent work. They now have fifteen or twenty miles of excellent roads in that town.

Mathew Roxbury came in from Black River on Wednesday Morning and shortly after his arrival one of his horses sickened and died.

Tom Bjoin has taken the mail route between this city and Red Lake Falls and will make tri-weekly trips. Stage office at Bjoin's livery stables.

A meeting is called for the city hall tomorrow night to organize a fire department. All interested in the welfare of our city should be there.

The Polk County Agricultural Society met on Saturday night, elected officers and decided to hold a fair upon the grounds some time in September.

Herb Mason received some fine southern melons on Monday, the first of the season. They were all gobbled up too quick but he expects more along shortly.

Miss Ida Piper will answer the telephone calls during the absence of Miss. Lizzie Malone who has posponed her trip to Minneapolis till next week, pending the illness of Mrs. Guse.

The police are on the look-out for stove pipes sticking through roofs and intend to be thorough in the matter. This is a good idea as "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

Mr. Edward Lanctot, whose farm lies partly in Crookston and partly in Gentilly, brought in a sample of wheat and oats, the wheat being 4 feet and 8 inches tall and the oats 7 feet and 1 inch, well headed.

Hon. B. Sampson on Tuesday returned from a brief visit to St. Paul. He informs us that the company intend to put up a large barn and sheds near the mill at once. The work on the bridge will be commenced at an early day.

Mr. John B. Carle came in from his farm on business this week and was taken sick at the Montreal house which obliges him to delay his return to his farm for a few days. The doctor says that he will be able to be out in a short time.

During the storm, last week, a hay stack on section 12, Fairfax township, containing about 30 tons of hay belonging to Peter Cornelius, was struck by lightning and entirely consumed. The loss is very severe as hay is a rather scarce article this year.

I. J. Brin is closing out his entire stock of goods at close figures to make room for a large stock of fall and winter goods. He will remove the stock of millinery now in the little shop south of the post office into the large building where the ladies may find a superb stock of millinery goods constantly on exhibition.

We are pleased to be able to announce that the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher will appear in the new Congregational church in the city on Wednesday evening, August 8th when he will deliver his famous lecture on "Evolution." This is positively Mr. Beecher's last appearance in the Northwest and all who ever desire to hear him must avail themselves of this opportunity. It is needless for us to introduce him as all know Mr. Beecher to be the greatest preacher living. Tickets for sale at Tom Morris.

ANOTHER LAND-MARK GONE.

Another old land-mark has gone up in fire and smoke. The fire-bell's startling tones, at about 1:30 on Saturday morning proclaimed that the fire-fiend was holding high carnival in our city, and soon it was known to our citizens that the old Hoover house, opposite the depot was the victim. The house was occupied by Pat. Clary as a boarding house and was well filled with boarders at the time. Engineer Fred Chapin and Clark VanHousen were sleeping in their room up stairs when they were aroused by Bruno, a large Newfoundland dog, and getting up to turn him out, Fred discovered that the shed roof was all ablaze; he immediately gave the alarm and the boys began at once to prepare to move out, but so rapid was the progress of the flames they only succeeded in saving their own and S. E. Chapin's trunks and a few other traps, losing about $150, among which Stuart mourns the loss of a costly guitar and a fine bass viol. Mr. Clary's loss was severe as what furniture was saved was damaged badly. The citizens worked hard, under great difficulties, chiefly the lack of water. A small house adjoining, belonging to policeman Ben McKinney was torn down thus confining the fire to the doomed building. The house was built by Martin Hoover in 1877. It was owned by H. B. Montgomery, valued at $2,500, partly insured.

Supposed Suicide

Grand Forks Plaindealer.

W. J. Newton, agent for Sterret, Hill & Childs, grain dealers, etc., was found dead in his bead in the private office of the elevator this morning. On the table was a note written in a plain hand as follows:

B. S. Kelly: Send me home at once. W. J. N. On another slip of paper was the name and address of a Traill county man: "George J. Bourger Blanchard, Traill Co., D. T.," and it was afterwards discovered that he had been corresponding with the latter gentleman regarding a trunk.

Judge Cutts was notified and summoned the following jury: Capt. H. E. Maloney, Newt. Porter, and J. H. Shepard. The jury held a session in the room where the man died. Dr. Wheeler was present and gave it as his opinion that the man might have died from strychnine, but there was nothing positive. Arsenic or opium had not been used. Walter Chatfield was sworn and stated that he had been working for Mr. Newton around the elevator, and for the past week he had been complaining of feeling unwell. He (Chatfield) came down to the elevator Friday morning and Newton told him that he would not work that day. The next morning on coming to the elevator he found a card on the door with the words, "Gone home sick." This morning Chatfield went to the elevator, and contrary to the usual custom found the outside door unlocked. He went in and found the key in the door of the private office, and after waiting a few moments went in and found the man dead, and at once notified the authorities. The jury found a sealed letter addressed to Newton's wife, at Crookston, inside of which was a ten dollar bill and a blank sheet of note paper. Judge Cutts found outside the private office a bottle of aconite, which the doctor examined, and stated that although enough had been taken out of the bottle to poison a man, it was supposed that a man would use more than had been removed. The jury, after some discussion, decided to adjourn until 2 o'clock.

Newton's family is at Crookston, and they were immediately notified by Mr. Kelly, where he was boarding. Mr. Kelley, upon being interviewed, stated that Newton went over to Crookston Friday and returned Saturday. He did not appear to be sick, but was in his usual spirits. He was seen last night at about 8 o'clock, and no one noticed any-thing unusual about him.

It matters little what the man's past life has been. His employers have found him faithful and ever looking after their interests. If the man committed suicide no reason has been assigned, but the fact of his leaving a note directed to the man at whose place he was boarding, and who he must have known would be one of the first to miss him, would indicate that he had a fore-knowledge of death. Although nothing but the aconite was found, and very little of that used, he might have been familiar with the drug and known just how much to use. It is the general opinion that he committed suicide.

The jury met again at 2:30, and after examining Frank Witt, who found a common whisky glass near the elevator, and Dr. Wheeler, who found strichnine sediment in the glass and also strychnine in the stomach of the deceased, the jury rendered a verdict that W. J. Newton came to his death by strychnine administered by his own hand.

The Land of Plenty

We are indebted to our correspondent for a sample of wheat and barley grown in the towns of Northland and Higdem, towns No. 153 north, range 49 and 50. We value this sample for many reasons, 1st: hardly a year ago this section of country was visited by expert farmers as some people term them, who after a short sojourn reported that section of the country useless for farming purposes. But we are pleasd to say onr practical farmers would not agree with them, and immediately set out with a firm resolve to give it at least a fair test, and after a thorough investigation come to the conclusion that all the country required was drainage, to make it one of the best farming districts in Dakota or Minnesota. The important question to solve was, how can we drain this country? Before the farmers had time to take action on the matter, the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad company sent out a corps of engineers, under Assistant Chief Engineer G. W. Tonson, to make a survey for a large and mammoth ditch, and after the engineers had made a survey, the company took steps to complete the ditch at once, and immediatly put at work six of the New Era road graders, and in a short time they nearly finished a mammoth ditch, or canal, as the farmers term it, through towns 151, 152 253 and 154, range 49. It is needless to mintion the amount of good it has done for all the farmers, besides drainage som 30 miles of otherwise worthless country belonging to the company, and conveying all the surface water into the Snake river; which, through some misunderstanding on the part of the railroad company or their employes, was not prepared to receive such a large volume of water. This branch of the river, into which the waters of the ditch flow was left full of old logs, brush and weeds. We are informed that it was no fault of the company, as they last fall sent a crew of men from St. Pall, to remove all rubbish from the stream. Instead of cleaning the resevoir branch, they cleaned one flowing from an opposite direction, consequently it did not do the required work in that particular place, and it is hoped the company will remedy it this season by removing the obstacles. The New Era grader company have renewed their contract for the completion of the above important work, and have three graders at work, with all the men possible to employ.

Mr and Mrs. M. E. Kirsch, of Euclid, paid the JOURNAL a pleasant call on Tuesday. Mr. K. reports crops in his section superb.

F. T. HASELTINE,
Dated July 24th, 1883. [13-15]

Camilla Urso with her company appeared in Ericsson's Hall on Tuesday evening. As a whole we did not think much of the entertainment while the piano and violin music was fine the other business, might have been omitted without leaving an aching void in the minds of the audience. The French song by Hansen reminded one of a full brass band—too much music for a dry goods box. A fierce large man waltzed out and declaimed in wonderful tones of stage tragedy "Horatius at the bridge" and "Betsey and I are out," and the audience were sorry he hadnt stayed "out" as that part of the program might well have been left out if in its stead they had troted out the violinist who was received with enthusiasm every time she came out. Her style is very different from that of Remenyi, who by the way is an enthusiast who seems to live in his music pouring forth the sweetest strains from a soul full of music that just wells forth spontaneously and he cant help it, while Camilla seems to play more by rule. Her execution is remarkably fine especially in music sweet and low which seems to be her forte. Her rendition of "The Last Rose of Summer" and "Way down upon the Suwanee Ribber" was sweet. She is unquestionably the greatest lady violinist living and it was well worth the price of admission to listen to her sweet music. The Band boys just paid their expenses and that's all where they ought to have made a handsome sum if the entertainment had been patronized as it deserved.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

EXECUTION IN BURMAH.

The Cruel Way in Which Royal Personages are Put to Death.

I asked my companion whether many executions took place here now, and he replied: "There have been none for several weeks, because the palace intrigues have kept everybody in authority too busy scheming, plotting, and planning to allow them to get up a public execution; but not many months ago I saw a band of a score or more men and women murdered on this sanguinary hillock. Some of the victims had royal blood in them, and they were not butchered in the common way. Imagine to yourself a princess charmingly dressed in silks and jewels, with flowers intertwined in her jet black hair, being pushed or goaded up this hill. The crowd of spectators clustered in the rice fields there, or perched upon the roofs of the houses you see peeping forth among the mango trees over against us on our extreme right, set up a shout. It is not a shout of pity or mercy. It is merely one of holiday excitement. It is like the murmur you might hear once at Newgate when the felon appeared upon the scaffold, or in the Place de Greve when the victim's head was laid on the block beneath the guillotine. The sun is pouring down its brightest rays, which appear to concentrate with their greatest brightness on this hillock. One executioner unbinds the girl's raven hair, throws the pretty flowers away, twists a tress of it round his hands, and pulls her head violently backward. Another executioner grasps a bamboo bludgeon with both hands. One, two, three! He swings it in the air, and down it falls upon that outstretched throat. One, two, three! and again it strikes the poor, gasping victim on the same place. The body falls lifeless, though still quivering. The princess is dead. Her body is cast aside disdainfully.

"Then look at this other group of men hustling a handsome young Burmese in their midst—hauling at him, tugging at him, to get him to the summit of the mound. He also is of royal blood. Pride of race, and that disregard for death which buoys up your true Buddhist as strongly as does the fatalism of the Wahabee, preserves equanimity in his deportment. He has flung something away over among the crowd. It is only his sheroot. He has done with it, and long before the brown urchin who has picked it up will have blown the last embers from it, the spark of life of its original owner will have joined elements, and one more Buddhist soul will have started off on its vast career of transmigration. See, he stands there cool and collected, his profile a clear, dark outline against the unclouded sky. A high cheek-boned executioner seizes his long black hair in front and pulls his head forward until his chin adjoins his breast. The second executioner spits on his hands, grasps his bamboo club firmly, and—whish! whish! the bludgeon hisses through the air and falls on the nape of the neck of the victim. He falls forward on his face, the first executioner still holding on the hair. A second blow on the back of the neck, while the man lies prostrate, settles the matter. An experienced touch on the red and bruised neck tells the executioner that the vertebra is broken and that life has fled. Once more the body is spurned aside, and more victims are dragged up the hill. But these latter are only common victims and are killed in a common way."

I venture to ask my friend what he calls common killing. He explains: "According to the Burmese law royal blood must not be shed. This injunction is literally obeyed, for while the women are clubbed across the throat and the men across the neck, no blood is spilt. The common people may be executed in any way. On the morning of which I speak the common people were hacked by a Burmese with a short sword until their heads rolled off. Sacre! it was a terrible spectacle, but I saw no sign of horror among the spectators. Executions in Independent Burmah are too common, and have been for centuries, to excite much public feeling. Every man, woman, and child knows that their turn may come next, just as they happen to encounter the displeasure of some high official. Come, let us be moving onward or these vultures will think we have come here to provide them with a feast."—Correspondence Philadelphia Press.

How Doctor's Advice Killed Jones.

"So Jones is dead?" said one Somerville man to another.

"Yes, poor fellow," was the reply, "he's gone."

"What did he die of?" inquired the first speaker.

"Starvation," was the answer.

"Starvation! Good gracious, the man was worth $50,000."

"I know that; nevertheless he died of starvation. I'll tell you how it was. Jones was always fancying there was something the matter with him; so he went to a doctor one day and had himself examined, and the doctor informed him that he had kidney disease, and that beside taking medicine, he must diet himself. Said the doctor: "You must avoid all kinds of salt meats, salt fish, potatoes, and vegetables of every kind." Jones followed the advice, but found himself no better. He went to another doctor, and, after being examined, was informed that he must avoid all kinds of fresh meats also. This did not do him any good, as he thought, and he went to another doctor, who highly approved of the advice which had previously been given, and further warned him against all kinds of pastry, likewise, shell-fish, including oysters and clams. "The best thing for you is a milk diet," said this doctor; so Jones lived upon milk. Not feeling himself any better, he went to another doctor, who cautioned him to avoid milk above all things if he wanted to get well. This reduced Jones to a diet of cold water and fresh air, and, finding himself no better under this regime, he went to another doctor, who advised him to beware of drinking too much water and being too much in the air. This last advice cut off the last of Jones' articles of diet, and he died of starvation, as I have told you."—Somerville Journal.

Story of a Prison Keeper.

On Aug. 19 Robert Caskey will complete fifty years of constant service as assistant warden of the Western penitentiary of Pennsylvania—a period of service said to be without a parallel in prison records. Mr. Caskey has lived several years beyond the biblical limit, but is still a hale and hearty man. "Yes, I have had some fights," he said the other day to a reporter. "The worst I ever had was with a prisoner named Duffy. I went into his cell, and he asked me if I was prepared to die. I laughed, and told him I had no trouble with him; but he answered, 'I have sworn to kill the first man that came in here.' With that he asked, 'Have you a knife?' 'No,' said I, 'I haven't.' 'Well, take this,' he said. He had got two shoe knives from the shop and fastened them in a piece of hickory broomstick, a blade sticking out each way. Then he had fashioned blades for another such weapon from the hinges of his bed. It was this knife he threw to me when he said 'Take this,' and as quick as that he struck at me with the knife he kept. There we were. It was dinner time and no one about, and like two duelists we faced each other. He missed me the first time, and on his second blow his knife passed between my left arm and my body. I shut down on it, and I held it there. Duffy had my other hand, and I couldn't strike, but he was in the same fix. Then we struggled, neither speaking. Twice we went down, but without breaking our holds, and I never thought of shouting. Finally, in kicking about the cell, we knocked over the bench and the noise was heard by the chaplain. He ran down and assistance came that overpowered Duffy. Both of us were worn out, but neither was cut."

Rigidity of Court Etiquette.

The court etiquette, observes a London correspondent, has grown more rigid and inflexible during these months of increasing morbidness, and soon, it is feared, the queen will be as far removed from her people as a Chinese emperor. She carries out her willful insistence upon etiquette in every least detail, and even when it concerns only her own children and grandchildren. When the Princess Louise returned from Canada, and arrived at Windsor, she was kept waiting until she had changed her attire and until the queen had sent word she was prepared to receive her. It is reported that the princess entered the drawing-room in the evening to await dinner, dressed in a most lovely crimson velvet gown, with crimson silk hose to match. The queen happened to espy the princesses's feet, said: "Do you know that colored stockings are not permitted in my presence? Go to your room at once and change your stockings." And so the poor princess came down to dinner in a crimson velvet dress, wearing white stockings! No one of the royal children ever visits the queen except by special and formal invitation. Her majesty appoints the hour for her own children to come and for them to go. One can imagine the unnaturalness of such a household. The Prince Consort was stately, but he was a genial happy, mirth-loving gentleman. He was a most affectionate husband and father, and no royal etiquette ever stood in the way of his fine German heartiness. Since his death his children have had no parental companionship, and they are as far removed from the queen as though they had not been born of her. It is well known that the prince of Wales has very great influence with his mother, and is personally deeply attached to her. He was a constant companion of his father; and he quite remembers how his father managed the queen in the old days. The prince is said to be most charming in his relations to his mother, and is always upon his most beautiful manners in her presence. He at times does approach her with great affection, and even tenderness of feeling and demonstration.

The Public Printing Office.

A Washington correspondent says: But few persons have any idea of the extent of the work done at the government printing office in this city. Volume nine of the "Rebellion Record" is now in print there, and will be issued in a few days. There will be ninety-six volumes in the entire work. Up to volume sixteen has been put in type and are waiting for the indexes. Eleven thousand copies are printed of this work, and they are distributed by the secretary of war. Every set has been promised.

Several fine works of the geological survey are now going through the press. These works are profusely illustrated with fine engravings, and are much sought after. Three thousand copies only are printed of these works.

Work has also been commenced on the chronological list of publications of the government. It is being compiled by the senate committee on printing. This work will be comprised in about 2,000 pages the size of the Congressional Record. It will probably be finished by the time of the next meeting of congress. Nineteen hundred copies will be printed.

Five volumes of the "Medical and Surgical History of the War" have been printed and delivered by the Public Printer, leaving one volume yet to print, copy of which has not yet been furnished. Ten thousand copies were printed, and it is said that they are valued so highly by those who have received them and are in such demand that a set of these works cannot now be obtained for love or money.

Work has just been commenced on the list of pensioners which was ordered by Congress last session. The work will make about 4,000 octavo pages of nonpareil type, and will comprise 300,000 names, giving the name of each pensioner by State, county, etc. Nineteen hundred copies will be printed for distribution by members of Congress.

The printing of the results of the tenth census is well advanced, most of it now being in type. Nothing but the compendium, in two volumes, has yet been printed and distributed. So far 11,000 pages have been put in type. Volumes embracing the following subjects are in type: Population, manufactures, agriculture, public indebtedness, valuation, taxation, etc., mining statistics, laws, etc., social statistics, fish and fisheries, fire and life insurance, cotton production, statistics of railroads, steamships, etc.; newspaper and periodical press, water power, steam pumps and pumping engines, statistics of quarry industry, meat production, petroleum, Alaska Fur seal islands, etc.

The Printed Calico Business.

The printed calico business for the last six months has been anything but satisfactory to the manufacturers. The supply has been excessive, and commission houses began to unload at figures which soon produced a demoralization of the market. This was aided by the action of leading retailers, who vied with each other to give the best print for a nickel, and finally finer goods were effected and the elegant satines, which equaled the foreign makes of last year, and were quick at 25 to 37 1-2 fell to 12 1-2 cents, or to rank of a nine-penny calico. The day for making money by printing 64 square cloth seems to have passed; the production is too large and the competition too sharp to admit of a living profit. The consumer is beginning to find out that it is no economy to buy a five cent calico dress as it takes as much time and labor to make it up as it does a stronger and better material. It behoves the manufacturer, then, to make and print a better cloth, with fast colors and texture firm enough to stand at least 12 month's exposure to sunlight and washtub. The 64 square cloth is a relic of the Rebellion period, when cheap fabrics were used because they could be made at a low price. To-day the cry is for something durable as well as pretty, and although cotton printed will be worn as long as there are women to wear it, yet it will be the prints that makes the best goods that will pay the best dividend. Lawns are growing less in demand every year. Every summer there is something that rages. Last year it was polka dots and this year it is a small check known as "pin check."

No negro, it is said, has ever taken out a patent in this country.

Saved.

There were times during the Sepoy rebellion in India when men were more to be dreaded than wild beasts; but the following minor incident of that reign of terror shows how the lives of two English soldiers, exposed to both perils, were strangely saved through the preference of a tiger for native flesh. The young men had been suddenly captured on rear-guard duty by a prowling band of Moslems, and were being marched to the place of imprisonment and torture. At the first night's camp, they were meditating escape in the vain hope that their guards would fall asleep

Two hours passed. The fire burned low, and in spite of the danger of their situation, were just dropping off to sleep when there was a tremendous roar—a rush of some great body passing over them; a scream from one of the natives; a yell of terror from the rest.

A tiger stood with one of the guards in his mouth, growling fiercely, and giving him an occasional shake, as a cat would shake a mouse, while one of its paws held down the prostrate figure of the other.

There was a wild stampede. Men tumbled over each other in their efforts to escape from the terrible presence and then, getting to their feet, started off at full speed. For a moment the English soldiers had lain paralyzed by the sudden advent of the terrible man-eater, and then had like the rest darted away.

"To the jungle!" Ned exclaimed; and in an instant they plunged into the undergrowth, and were forcing their way at full speed through it.

Man-eating tigers are rarely found in pairs, and there was little fear that another was lurking in the wood; and even had such been the case, they would have preferred death in that form, to being murdered in cold blood by the enemy.

Presently they struck on a track leading through the wood, and followed it, until in five minutes they emerged on the other side. As they did so they heard a report of firearms in the direction of their last halting place, and guessed that the peasants were firing at hazard in hopes of frightening the tiger into dropping its prey. As to their own flight, it was probable that so far their enemies had not thought of it.

The first object of the fugitives was to get as far as possible from their captors, who would at day-break be sure to organize a regular hunt for them, and accordingly they ran straight ahead until in three-quarters of an hour they came into a wide road.

Towards morning they spied a large, fortified house, evidently the abode of some person of consequence, and determined to climb the garden-wall, and risk the chances of finding shelter and and protection. The house fortunately proved to be the home of a Hindoo lady of rank, who sympathized more with the English than with the Mohammedans and by her kindness they were put in the way of escape and final restoration to their friends.—In Times of Peril.

THE MARKETS.

ST. PAUL.

FLOUR—Steady and unchanged. Trade light. Quotations: Patents, Orange Blossom, $6.50@6.75; Red Cross, straights, $5.75; Capitol family, $5@5.25; Bakers', XXXX, $4; in barrels, 25c extra; outside brands, 25@50c per bbl less, according to quality; low grades, $2@2.50. Rye flour, $4@4.25 per bbl. Graham, $5@5.25 per bbl.

WHEAT—There was more inquiry for No. 1 hard, and the market was quotably firm on light supply. Bids were not as high as on Saturday, Chicago being lower in the morning hours. No. 2 hard was also lower. Year showed decline, but at the figures the feeling was strong. No. 1 hard, $1.09 bid; No. 1, $1.03 bid, $1.07 asked; No. 2, $1.04 bid; No. 1 hard, year, $1.04 bid.

CORN—There was a fair inquiry for corn, that helped to make asking prices stronger by 2c. Samples were put on the board, and some attention was brought out by them. No. 2, 52c asked; year, 41c bid, 46c asked; No. 3, 43c asked; rejected, 42c asked. Sales: 1 car No. 3, 43c; 1 car do, 42½c; 1 car do, outgoing, 47c.

OATS—The market was fairly active. Spot was lower in bids, but futures were stronger on good demand. The market showed considerable life, more than for several days past. Bids and asking figures were quickly made, and prices closed firm. No. 2 mixed, 32c bid, 33c asked for spot and July; August, 30c bid, 31c asked; September, 29½c bid, 30c asked; year, 29c bid and asked. Sales: 1 car No. 2 mixed, 33c; 1 car do, 38c, sacks included; 1 car No. 2 mixed, July, 33c; 5,000 bu do, September, 29c; 1,000 bu do, year, 29c.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—There is nothing in the situation that can be considered an improvement, though the market is assuming a slightly firmer tone. Minnesota patents are quoted in New York at $5.60@7.25, and in Chicago at $5.30@6.90. Local quotations are: Patents, $6.75; straights, $5.40@5.55; clears, $4.65@5.10; low grades, $1.85@3.

WHEAT—Much was offered, but sales were few, being limited to No. 3 at 95c, and sample wheat at 95c@93c. For No. 1 hard $1.10 was bid, and for No. 2 hard, $1.05. Quotations: No. 1 hard, $1.10½; No. 2 hard, $1.06; No. 1 Northern, $1.05; No. 2 Northern, $1.01; No. 1, $1.03; No. 2, $1; No. 3, 95c; Millers' association prices: No. 1 hard, $1.07; No. 2 hard, $1.02; No. 1 regular, $1; No. 2, 97c; No. 3, 87c; No. 4, 77c.

CORN—Dull and weak, with no trading. Quotable nominally at 46c for No. 2, and 44@45c for condemned by sample.

OATS—Offerings were free, but bids were few. Quotable at 34c for No. 2 mixed; white, 35c; rejected, 30@32c, by sample.

MILWAUKEE MARKET.—Flour, in fair demand. Wheat, weak and lower; August $1.01¾; September, $1.04½; October, $1.06¼. Corn, lower; No. 2, 50½c; new, 45c; rejected, 42½c. Oats, shade lower; quiet and tame; No. 2 white, 35½c; in store, 37c delivered. Rye, quiet and unchanged. Barley, nothing doing. Provisions, declining; mess pork, $13.85 cash or August; $14 September. Lard, prime steam, $8.90 cash or August; $9 September. Butter, unchanged. Cheese, steady. Eggs, firmer; 14½c per doz for everything. Receipts—Flour, 9,000 bbls; wheat, 18,000 bu; barley, 3,000 bu. THE DANGER OF OVER-EXERTION

A Stalwart Man Becomes Weaker Than a Child and Then Recovers His Former Strength.

Waterloo, N. Y., Observer.

In these days of rowing giants and athletic heroes fine physical development is more observed than ever before since the time of the Athenian games. A man who shows the elements of physical power is looked up to far more than in the days of our ancestors possibly because there are fewer specimens of well-developed manhood than then. An emissary of this paper met a magnificent specimen of physical power a few days since in the person of Dr. A. W. McNames, of Waterloo. His muscles, which showed unusual development, were as hard as wood. At his request the writer sought to pinch him in the arms or legs, but found it wholly impossible. A realization of what is meant by an iron man was fully made manifest.

"Have you always been so stalwart as this?" inquired the news gatherer.

"Not by any means," was the reply. "When a young man I was always strong and active and felt that I could accomplish anything. This feeling so took possession of me on one occasion that I attempted to lift a box which four men found it impossible to move. I succeeded in placing it on the wagon, but in two minutes from that time I was unconscious and remained so for hours and when I recovered consciousness I vomited a large quantity of blood. From that day I began to grow weak and sickly. I believed that I had suffered some internal injury and experienced a general debility, which seemed similar to the effects produced by malaria. My back was very weak. I had no appetite, and at times loathed food. My lips were parched and cracked. My head felt as though it were entirely open at the top and it pained me on the side intensely. In six weeks time I had fallen away from 208 pounds to less than 170. I was in a most wretched condition. I was completely discouraged."

"What did the doctors say about you?"

"Almost everything. I consulted no less than six different physicians. They all treated me and none did me any good. At that time I was suffering intensely. I could not sit upright but was obliged to rest in a cramped, uneasy position. I was compelled to urinate every five minutes and passed over three quarts every day. I was not living, I was existing.

One night (how well I remember it!) my wife had put the children all in bed when the feeling came over me that I should live but a very short time. My wife and I talked matters all over and I gave the minutest directions as to what she should do after I was gone. I was not in a flighty condition by any means for the doctor on leaving town the day following, bade me good bye saying he never expected to see me again, for I was suffering with Bright's disease of the kidneys in its last stages. Within the next few days more than twenty friends came to bid me good bye. Among the number was Dr. John L. Clark. He asked me what I had used in the way of medicines. I told him. He then recommended a remedy of which I had heard much, but about which I was very skeptical. If faith were an element of power it certainly was lacking in my case."

"And so you did not try it?"

"On the contrary, I did try it and to my surprise it seemed to go to just the spot. Indeed, it was the most palatable thing I had taken into my mouth for months. I relished it."

"And did it cure you?"

"Do I look as if it did?"

"Yes, indeed. What was it?"

"Warner's Safe Cure."

"A proprietary medicine!"

"Of course. What of that? I suppose I once had as a great a prejudice against advertised medicines as any one could have. When I was studying medicine at Ann Arbor, Michigan, I used to vow with the rest of the class that we could fight all such remedies at all times. When a man comes down to the last hour, however, and bids his wife and friends goodbye, such bigoted prejudices as these all vanish, I can assure you and any remedy that can cure is gladly welcomed."

"And how have you been since then?"

"As well—or better than before."

"Do you still exert your strength?"

"Certainly. But I do not over-exert, as formerly. My strength is increasing every day, and my health is number one. I know that my life was saved by Warner's Safe Cure, and I believe it is the best medicine that was ever compounded by any chemist or physician. I am willing the doctors should sneer at me for such a statement if they choose, but I have proven its truth, and am prepared to stand by it."

The above experience should be of great value to all who are suffering. It shows the deceptive nature of this terrible malady; that all symptoms are common to it and that there is but one way by which it can be absolutely avoided.

Hannibal Hamlin on Spain.

In a recent conversation with a correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer, Hannibal Hamlin said of Spain: "Spain I consider to be improved as a kingdom. The present king has been at work to regenerate his land and I think is doing so. There is more pride and character in Spain than in all the rest of Europe, but on account of the climate there is a prevailing indolence which represses the activity of the people. They all say to-morrow when you propose anything to be done. I have had persons come to me to get my official signatures on papers, and when I would take up my pen to write it they say, "Your excellency, let me come back to-morrow," and were really pained to find that I wanted to do an act on the spot. That disposition runs through their government.

"I recollect that there were some cigars sent to me, and it is the custom to let them come in free, but in order to have a little agreeable red tape an application must be made in writing. The cigars were sent to me, and when I had smoked up the last one in the box, several months afterward, along came the permission to bring them in. Spanish women are very beautiful, but they do not wear after youth. There is a great mortality among the children in Spain, and I ascribe it to their parents keeping them up half the night, as they sit out on the public promenade till long after midnight. The Moors were unquestionably the able men of Spain, and in driving them out the Spanish people wrote the edict of their own decay. Yet I went over to the Barbary states to look at the Moors, and I also found that by losing Spain they had lost their civilization. All the great and all the best public works in Spain are of Moorish construction."

He said that the Portuguese were a superior race to the Spanish in practical sense, industry and development. The King of Spain spoke English, but his wife spoke it better, and at times corrected him when he was in an interview with Mr. Hamlin. He said she was not pretty, but made an excellent impression by her earnestness and graciousness.

PERRY DAVIS' Pain-Killer

PAIN KILLER

A SAFE AND SURE REMEDY FOR Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Cramps, Cholera, Diarrhoea, Dysentery. Sprains AND Bruises, Burns AND Scalds Toothache AND Headache. For Sale by all Druggists.

TUTT'S EXPECTORANT

Is composed of Herbal and Mucilaginous products, which permeate the substance of the Lungs, expectorates the acrid matter that collects in the Bronchial Tubes, and forms a soothing coating, which relieves the irritation that causes the cough. It cleanses the lungs of all impurities, strengthens them when enfeebled by disease, invigorates the circulation of the blood, and braces the nervous system. Slight colds often end in consumption. It is dangerous to neglect them. Apply the remedy promptly. A test of twenty years warrants the assertion that no remedy has ever been found that is as prompt in its effects as TUTT'S EXPECTORANT. A single dose raises the phlegm, subdues inflammation, and its use speedily cures the most obstinate cough. A pleasant cordial, children take it readily. For Croup it is invaluable and should be in every family. In 25c. and $1 Bottles.

TUTT'S PILLS ACT DIRECTLY ON THE LIVER.

Cures Chills and Fever, Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Bilious Colic, Constipation, Rheumatism, Piles, Palpitation of the Heart, Dizziness, Torpid Liver, and Female Irregularities. If you do not "feel very well," a single pill at bed-time stimulates the stomach, restores the appetite, imparts vigor to the system. Price, 25c. 35 Murray St., N. Y. WRITE FOR TUTT'S MANUAL FREE.

THE MAN O' AIRLIE.

Oh, there aboon yon heather hill,
Where footfa' comes but rarely,
There is a house they point out still
Where dwelt the man o' Airlie.
He wore a coat o' hodden gray,
His hand was hard wi' labor;
But still he had a hamely way
O' stannin' by his neighbor.

His burly laugh made men rejoice
His words the neighbors guided;
The little bairnies loved his voice,
And in his smile confided;
The words to-day that left his lip
Became a deed to-morrow;
Hoot, man, the friendship of his grip
Would lift the heart o' sorrow.

He was na' loud, he was na' proud,
He lacked in larnin' sairly,
And yet ye'd pick him frae a crowd,
The honest man o' Airlie.
His wealth it was na' in his hand,
It was na' in the city;
A mint o' honor was his hand.
His heart a mine o' pity.

He's dead an' gone, this prince o' Fife,
Mute is his burly laughter;
But, ah! the music of his life,
That bides wi' us lang after.
His memory lives; the man may die,
That lingers bright and lovin'
Just like a star lost frae the sky,
Whose ray survives his ruin.—Anon.

ERNEST VAN DORN.

It is the fashion these days to relate pure fiction with an air of simple truth; and if one should happen by any chance to tell the very truth, he must by all means call it fiction, or who will care to hear? Will you listen to this true story of the rocks and "snags" which beset the course of true love in California?

Some years ago the pursuit of the phantom health led me into the wilderness of one of our "cow counties," and brought me to a stand in a flourishing dairy ranch. There I spent two brilliant summer months, courting the airy, mocking sprite—with what success it matters not now, since it is not my story you are to hear, but Ernest Van Dorn's.

He was 25 then, tall and broad shouldered, with black eyes, usually brimming with mirth, and a strong, dark beard that matched his hair. To make the portrait complete you must see him in a hunter's suit of butternut hue, with a rifle over his shoulder, for he was a deer-hunter. Such a portrait he once sketched with pen and ink for a miss who wanted his "picture."

My first glimpse of him, however, was on Sunday, and he wore a fine black suit, which he had bought in deference to the dear ones far away—for the boy Ernest had ran away from a wealthy home in Holland, and once in the week he must bring that home a little nearer by a dress more suited to his father's heir.

A few mornings after my arrival I strolled into the woodshed and found Ernest moulding bullets for his rifle.

"That's easy, pretty work," said I after watching him a while.

"Yes. I wish I could mould out twenty-dollar gold pieces as easily."

"Now, don't be lazy," I said, "that's my prerogative. Stand up and let me look at you."

So he stretched up his full height, and looked so strong and hearty that we both laughed aloud.

"That will do. Now go to work and earn all the twenties you want."

And having discharged my feminine rifle, I sauntered back into the house, took up my pen, and fell into a reverie—the subject of my reverie being the wish of Ernest Van Dorn. I felt morally certain this wish was something more than the idle, foolish expression it seemed. I was recalled at last by the plaintive tones of Ernest's violin, upon which he was playing "Lorena." "Ah!" thought I, "so that's the clew." Then he dashed off into the "Hunters' Chorus," from Der Freischuetz, and I fell to writing, just as though it were possible, by the greatest industry to make up for the hour lost in musing.

At dinner the conversation turned upon the recent marriage of a young girl to a wealthy ranchman of sixty summers. The comments upon the young girl's act included every shade of pity, congratulation, condemnation and excuse. Every one had an opinion and gave it fully, without one thought of the desperate strait to which that young girl may have been reduced before she bartered away her most cherished treasure—her youthful romance. Only Ernest was silent as a ghost. His face was pale, his lips drawn and the light and mirth had all died out of his eye. In one moment it had all passed, and he was teasing the twelve-year-old Chloe, overwhelming her with most redundant politeness till the poor, silly child really thought he was paying her serious attentions.

"What do you think about the affair Ernest?"

"Oh, I suppose the girl knew what she was about, but money does help a fellow along wonderfully in such matters."

He spoke carelessly, but he knew I had been watching him, and I knew he would tell me his story sometime.

The long, bright weeks passed on, bringing us a succession of those brilliant days when the sun shines clear and strong through the crystal air, yet without oppressive heat; when the atmosphere is of such a delightful temperature that you never think whether it is warm or cool. To breathe such an air is to partake of a richer, purer stimulant than ever art can furnish—nature's own.

On the morning of such a day Ernest and I mounted our horses for a long, long ride over the hills. This is the story he told me that July day.

"How is it Ernest," said I, "that you have been working all these years and now have nothing more to show for it? Do you not get very tired of drifting about in this aimless way?"

"Yes, I do, I ought to be ashamed of myself for being such a lazy fellow."

The penitent look he wore was none the less amusing for being so thoroughly sincere.

"No, I don't think you are lazy. You make money enough, but let it slip. Isn't it time for you to be getting some property and establish yourself somewhere? That is what I mean."

"Well Miss Carby' I will tell you all about it," and he drew a long breath.

"Five years ago I had saved money enough to stock a ranch. It's easy for a man to make money and save it, too, when he has such good use for it as I had. Then I found a first-rate ranch, and hired it for three years. I thought by that time I could say something about buying it. I tell you, there wasn't a gayer, happier young fellow in the country round, for I was going to be married in the spring, and take my wife home to that little house in the hills, and used to get letters from home asking all sorts of questions. My sisters wanted to know all about her—what was she like? was she pretty? and so on. I told them she had the prettiest blue eyes, the brightest hair, and the softest, sweetest voice in the world—you can't say that of some of the girls voices. But when they asked if she was well educated, I didn't know what to say. You see my brother and sister have always lived in the city, and they don't know anything about how we lived out here. If Minnie had been educated like them it isn't likely she would ever have had anything to do with me. I never told Minnie anything about the ranch because she never asked me anything about business, and I liked to have her trust me that way. Because, I wanted to surprise her sometime with my nice arrangements. I used to often say I'd build a little shanty out of shakes, and we'd be king and queen in it, and live on air and sunshine.

"There was an old bachelor who had a large ranch, not far from the little place where Minnie's father and mother lived. People said he was worth $40,000, but I never believed it. After a while I began to meet him there pretty often, but never minded it all, for I thought, of course, he came to talk over stock with her father. The old man, Minnie's father, was full of his notions about stock, though he never got hold of more than a dozen cows at a time, and Spanish cattle at that. I never thought of being jealous, but it did trouble me the way the old folks treated me. They seemed to think I had no right to come there at all, and they didn't waste any politeness on me. I would not have cared much for that, either, for Minnie seemed fonder of me than ever, though she didn't show it much before them; but something was troubling her, I could see. Sometimes when I went there she looked so down-hearted I knew she had been crying. I would laugh and joke to cheer her up, till she would laugh, too, just like her old self; then, when I was about to leave the sad look would come back, and she would hardly let me go. Of course I began to understand what it all meant, but I was so sure of Minnie I felt like snapping my fingers at all the rest. I didn't think, you see, how young she was, and how much they might do to influence her—it's likely they were at her all the time.

"One time the young folks were getting up a ride. We were going down to Toki for a dance and supper, and then back by moonlight. I went to tell Minnie about it, and see if she would go.

"'Yes,' said she she, 'I am going, but I can't go with you, Ernest, for I have promised Mr. Murphy.'

"Then I knew she was going to give me up, and it made me so mad—and sorry, too, that I couldn't say one word, but just walked out of the house, without even a 'good-by.' It was a week before I cooled down enough to go and see her again. She didn't say anything about my staying away, but the heavy look in her eyes made me feel very bad. I tried to ask her kindly how she liked the party, but my voice must have sounded hard, for she answered up quick that they had a splendid time. Then I couldn't hold in any longer, and just said:

"'Now, Minnie, you must just choose between us two; things can't go on this way any more. Are you going to marry Mr. Murphy or are you going to marry me?'

"Oh, Ernest," said she, "you know Mr. Murphy can do so much for father and mother. Father hasn't much, and he's getting old, and they have no one but me."

"Do you think I would let them suffer?" said I. "I was too proud then to speak of my ranch, or any of my plans.

"Why, no," she said, "but he's rich, you know, and he's going to pay father's debts and set him up." Then I said:

"Tell me, Minnie, once for all, do you like him better than you do me?"

"I couldn't keep my voice quite steady and she began to cry.

"Oh, Ernest!" she said, "don't, don't ask me that, for I have given him my promise."

"Then," I said, "you'll have to take back the promise you gave me." And I left the house and never went back, you may be sure.

The cunning, mean old fellow! He knew he couldn't get her with just his money, so he kept telling her what he would do for her parents; but how could they be so mean and cruel?

"Well, I stayed around my ranch till they were married, and then I went off and left everything. I have never had anything to speak of since. About three years after I did take to saving my money and got together quite a little sum, when business kept me a few days in Tokita. Then it came out how much that skinflint Murphy had done for Minnie's parents. He had bought the poor little place they had been hiring for years, and put them in possession; but he had secured himself the few hundreds it cost by a mortgage on it, and now, I heard, he was going to foreclose and turn them out. I couldn't bear to put my little pile into his scrawny hand, but I then was not going to see those poor old people turned out of their home—I was only glad that I had money enough. He gave them back the mortgage with a great flourish of generosity, and of course I never told how it was. That is the only time I have ever seen Minnie in these five years. She did not seem to be getting much good of that thirty-thousand dollars, for things looked as though there had never been much more money on the premises. She looked a good deal older, and when I asked her how she was getting along, she just burst out crying. I felt so bad I didn't know what to do."

The poor fellow looked so thoroughly grieved at the thought of her suffering that I felt my own eyes grow dim.

"A sad, sad story," said I; "yet, after all; Ernest, does it not seem as though she had more to bear than you?"

"Why, yes—that is the worst of it. If I thought she was comfortable and happy, it wouldn't hurt me so."

"But, Ernest, no one would ever guess you had such an experience, to see you flirting with the girls as you do."

"And yet, until this year, I have scarcely spoken to a woman, except the one I boarded with."

"What was that for? Perhaps there was just a few good, sensible people in the world who do not value money above all things. Do you think I do, for instance?"

"No, you don't."

"And I do not think you do, Ernest, with all your talk. Possibly there are others."

"Yes, I know; and I'm am going to try and be good now."

"Glad to hear it. Ah! what do I see yonder? Methinks 'tis the Milk-white Doe! Who'll reach her first?" And off we raced after the young girl, a great favorite of mine.

Of course, the young man won the race.

"Good afternoon, Miss Emma."

"Howd' you do, Miss Carby?"

"Oh, we've been having a long ride, and I'm so tired. Here's Ernest wondering how women can be so weak. You go our way, I believe;" and I made room for the white pony between us."

Pretty soon I saw the little witch leaning over to see if her saddle was true.

"Better have it sinched up," said Ernest, "before we go down the long hill." So he helped her off, and she held his horse while he tightened her "sich."

"Oh, these women," said he; "what would they do without the men?"

"And, oh, these men," said I; "what would they do if they couldn't wait on the women?"

Then she put her little foot into his hand and sprang into the saddle. The thousand little airs that accompanied this performance were indescribably amusing to me.

That evening Ernest played a soft accompaniment on his violin while I sang "The Haunted Spring." I thought the young man needed a warning. The ballad recounted how the hunter bold pursued the "milk-white doe" to the verge of the haunted spring. There he found a lady fair "in robe of white," and pledged her his knightly faith upon a ring drawn from the fountain.

"To see you and Miss Emma together makes the story you told me seem like a dream." So I knew he was not "on with the new love" yet.

Early in the spring of last year an incident occurred which brought this story vividly to my mind. I was travelling from Sacramento to San Francisco, by way of Vallejo; when my attention was attracted by a pair of blue eyes—for I hold it to be one of woman's peculiar rights to admire another woman if she feels like it. When we exchanged the cars for the steamboat, I noticed her more particularly, for she sat next to me in the cabin. I observed that she was still young, not over thirty, and perhaps less, for trouble may have made the years pass heavily; that her possessions included a neat and tasty traveling suit, also a little boy with a very freckled face and a wide-awake, intelligent look in the bright eyes—so like his mother's, I noticed—also that the very sensible looking woman on the other side appeared to be her friend.

I coaxed the little freckle-face to a vacant seat beside me, and found abundant occupation in furnishing his very inquiring mind. How was I startled by this exclamation from my amiable friend:

"Oh Minnie, don't those look like the mountains around Tokita?"

In one moment she seemed transformed from an attractive stranger into an old and familiar acquaintance, and I could not resist the impulse to address her.

"Mrs. Murphy, is it not?"

"Yes, that is my name."

"I am Miss Carby of San Francisco. The mention of Tokita must be my excuse for speaking. That is your home is it not?"

"It was until my husband died. I live in Sacramento now. Have you ever been in Tokita?'

"No; but I once spent two pleasant months in the country, and heard much about you from an early friend of yours."

"Pray, which of my friends cared to speak of me?"

"It was Ernest Van Dorn."

"Then you know him?"

"I did then—almost five years ago—and it gives me much pleasure now to recall my acquaintance with him. You may imagine how well I came to know him when he told me how he lost you."

"Yes, indeed; for gay and lively as he was, he scarcely ever spoke of anything he felt very much. Poor Ernest! he was a great deal too good for me. But truly, Miss Carby, I would never have done as I did of my own free choice. They urged me till I was almost distracted."

They? Who? I did not ask; and soon learned that father and mother both were dead; that her husband's reputed wealth vanished like a morning dream; that he died, leaving her a heavy mortgage upon the ranch, so that she realized but a small sum from the sale of the property. This sum she had taken to Sacramento, and had gone into the millinary business with this "sensible friend."

At last she said: "Really Miss Carby you must have some witchcraft for finding out private histories. I am not so much surprised that Ernest told you his."

But, after all, I had not learned what I very much wanted to know; to what extent her late husband had made her life with him unhappy; what were her present feelings in regard to Ernest Van Dorn; and especially what would be the result if he should now appear before her, still "tender and true." It was plain that she had been gathering wisdom and strength of character in the years that had passed, whether dark or bright. Many a time in the months that followed, I found myself fancying how these two might come together, and their lives be filled at last with a love all the deeper and richer for what they had passed through. Still grew the earnest desire, and finally the confident hope that I might have a share in bringing about this delightful consummation.

It was with this hope strong within me that I looked forward to a week's sojourn at a farm-house in Napa valley—thinking vaguely and unreasonably that now should come my long sought opportunity. Not that I had been quite idle in the matter heretofore; I had written to the neighborhood where I had met Ernest Van Dorn, making inquiries about him. But the incorrigible rover had gone from there, leaving no track, and no one knew of his where-abouts. What reason had I to think our paths would ever cross again? Ah! my foolish hope was but rushing on to its sure destruction.

The evening of my arrival at the farm of my friend Sampson—the warmest night of the season, they called it—we sat with the doors and windows all open congratulating ourselves that such a night was rare enough to be counted a luxury. We were gathered around the sitting-room table. The outer door was behind me, and a juvenile Sampson on either side of me, as I gazed absorbed, through the open window, watching the harvest moon as it swelled up round and rosy above the dark, mysterious mountains. Friend Sampson evidently imagined that my interest was centered on a smaller mountain of wheat sacks that stood in the middle distance—for he said:

"That farm yonder belongs to an old acquaintance of yours. I never should have thought of his being one of your friends if he hadn't been so mighty pleased when I happened to say you were coming. Says he—"

What, I shall neuer know, for a voice broke in from the outer door, whose hearty tones, once so familiar, started me from my chair.

"Mr. Van Dorn! You here?"

"Seems so. Never mind, Freddie, she didn't mean to upset you." This to the little Sampson whom he rescued from his forced position upon the floor. "I heard you were coming to-day, and thought I'd run over to see you just a minute."

"Over from where? Not all the way from Tokita?"

"Hardly. That's my ranch over there—the one next to this. You see I'm not quite the good-for-nothing you once called me."

"As though I ever had called you so."

"Well, you thought it anyway. I tried to get my wife to come over with me, but she said she couldn't this evening, and she hoped you would leave all ceremony and come over to-morrow evening to make us a visit. We don't have visitors enough up here to keep us in manners, but we're glad enough to see them—'specially if they're old friends. You'll come, wont you?"

"Yes, perhaps." I hardly knew what I said, for I was at a funeral then—the funeral of my poor, dead hope.

He was gone, and I was at liberty to consider how very natural was this result, and how little foundation there had ever been for the fancy that he would continue always faithful to the old love, who had been false to him; above all, how hopeless had been the task I had set myself. I was disappointed, vexed with myself, and particularly vexed with Ernest. Plainly, I was too cross to be of any further use as a member of society for that evening, so nothing remained but to bid the family good-night and retire.

How I turned the matter over in my mind, wondering who the wife might be of whom he evidently was so proud. It could not be the "Milk-white Doe," for I had read of her marriage in the paper, and afterwards of her death, poor girl—one advantage of always reading those notices. I considered, too, whether he had ever seen the widow, Minnie; whether she knew of his marriage, and, if so, what she thought of it. Then my conscience smote me with a scourge of small chords, as I remembered how I had tried, by skillful praises of her early lover, to revive her old love for him, and by the story of his five years' mourning to awaken a new hope in her heart. Foolish meddler! What if I had succeeded.

Sleep found me in the firm resolve not to make the half-promised visit, and to let Mr. Van Dorn and "my wife" elaborately alone. But in the morning curiosity triumphed and I went. I passed through friend Sampson's pasture lot and out into the road, then turned into a stubble field on the other side of the highway and so on, up to the garden gate; and then paused among the roses to inspect the house. This was substantial and comfortable, neither showy nor very new; probably not of Ernest's building at all. A wide porch ran along the front at one side, the front portion being endowed in Castillian roses, and the side covered with grapevines, whose heavy clusters were just putting on their purple.

Ernest met me in the garden and led me in with an exultant air, as though I ought to be as delighted as he was—the egotist.

For once my obligations were fulfilled for what did I behold but the blue eyes and bonny hair of my charming fellow-traveler, and just behind her little freckle face!

"So this is Mrs. Van Dorn?"

"Yes, this is my wife. I think you have seen her before, and I am quite sure you have heard of her."

"Please tell me," I said, "how long is it since mistress Minnie became "my wife?"

She answered for him: "We were married just one week from the day I saw you."—Vanity Fair.

Wit and Humor.

Always in debt and no real necessity for it—the letter B.

Willie—"Mamma, will Susie and me have birthdays after we're dead?" Mamma—"Why, what do you mean?" Willie—"Why, like Washington,—don't you know?"—Harvard Lampoon.

"What!" said Mr. Sucker, "you haven't noticed what a dumpish, stupid girl she is? It's positively frightful. I never called on her that she didn't go to sleep within half an hour."—Boston Post.

A child, while walking through an art gallery with her mother, was attracted by a statue of Minerva, "Who is that?" said she. "My child, that is Minerva, the goddess of wisdom." "Why didn't they make her husband too?" "Because she had none, my child." "That was because she was wise, wasn't it, mamma?" was the artless reply.—[Harper's Bazar.

The Boy Hit It.—"Father, you are an awful brave man," said a Detroit youth as he smoothed down the old man's grey locks the other evening. "How do you know that, Willie?" "Oh, I heard some men down at the store say that you killed thousands of soldiers during the war." "Me? Why, I was beef contractor for the army!" "Yes, that's what they said!" explained young innocence as he slid for the kitchen.

Chamber's Journal recalls these ancient jokes: A Sybarite on a visit to Sparta partook of the homely public meal. He then observed: "No wonder the Sparatans fought well, for the greatest coward would rather face death than live on such fare." Demades compared the Athenians to a clarionet—"Take out their tongues and they are good for nothing." A certain schoolmaster was reading badly. Theocritus said to him: "Why don't you teach geometry?" "Because I don't understand it." "Then why do you teach reading?" A thief caught in the act said to Demosthenes: "I didn't know it was yours." "No," was the reply: "but you knew it wasn't yours."

Near and Far-Sightedness.

Near-sighted boys and girls are often surprised to find how much farther their companions can see than themselves. Some can tell the time of day indicated by a distant church-clock, where they cannot even make out the clock itself. But there are fine tests in the heavenly bodies, well-known to astronomers, and with which any boy or girl may become familiar.

The Pleiades is a famous constellation, with which is associated a tradition coming down from Grecian times that one of its stars suddenly dissappeared. An eye of ordinary power can easily make out six stars; a stronger vision can count eleven, and some with extraordinary powers can discern thirteen or fourteen. With a telescope the number visible varies from fifty to one hundred.

Everybody knows the Great Dipper. The middle star in the handle has a companion star; which a tolerably good eye can detect. A stronger eye can detect a third and fainter star. It requires the best eyes to pick out the moons of Jupiter, but this has been done by a few. It is comparitively easy to see them when two are in conjunction, and thus present a larger surface to the eye.

It may afford no little amusement to our readers to test their vision by experimenting, some clear night, on the constellations we have mentioned.

Fact and Poetry.

The following story of the veteran writer, John Timbs, is interesting: While sub-editor of the Illustrated London News, he sent a cut of a hop-field to a contributor, and asked him to go down to Maidstone, visit the hop-gardens, take a note of all he might see and hear, and describe the scene as faithfully and accurately as he could. The conscientious writer went and spent a day and night among the "savory" hop-pickers. Next day he took his "copy" to his office. The venerable Mr. Timbs adjusted his spectacles and began to read. Before he had got through the third slip he burst out with, "What's this, Mr. Smith? Do you really think he would put this in the News?—oaths, intemperance, impiety, debauchery, licentiousness—why, sir, what were you thinking about? This will never do!" "No, I thought not," replied the writer; "but you told me to describe exactly what I saw and heard." "Yes, yes; but really; you know, this is too gross, too gross." "Perhaps this will do better," calmly remarked Mr. Smith, as he handed another MS. to Mr. Timbs. "Read it, sir, read it," said the sub-editor. Mr. Smith read aloud, and his listening chief was charmed—such well-turned phrases, such happy conceits, such poetic descriptions! "That is better, Mr. Smith—much; just what I wanted." "Ah," said Smith, quietly, "I thought you would like that; it's what I wrote before I went down to Maidstone."

FIELD AND FARM.

Agricultural Items.

Remember, when Jack Frost holds sway again, that good hay, a generous supply of grain and plenty of roots will make good butter and plenty of it.

Peluro-pneumonia increases alarmingly among milch cows on Staten island, and the New York state board of health has asked the national cattle-plague commission to look the matter up.

For the past four years the great current of cattle traffic from the west has been met by an increasing current of young animals in an opposite direction, to be matured on western pastures.

C G. Patton who has experimented largely with Russian apples, procuring scions from St. Petersburg, says he is greatly disappointed in them, and states in the Iowa Homestead, that there are not enough Russian apple trees in the United States to supply one country with trees that they are not as hardy as represented; are generally subject to blight, though a few good growers are exempt; fruit of low quality, not comparing favorably with American apples.

Fresh vegetables for the early fall months are quite as much a luxury as in early springtime. After the first crop is taken off the ground that is the end of the vegetable season in many of our farm gardens. And yet if the soil be in good condition it can produce a second or even a third crop as well as not. But we should select early maturing varieties and the seeds should be planted somewhat deeper than in spring.

Planting for honey is a matter now receiving considerable attention from apiarists, who are seeking the best means for avoiding the lack of honey which comes between the blooming of fruit trees and white clover. The Indiana farmer says on this point: "This is the most important dearth, which the bee-keeper must strive to bridge over by planting. The stimulus given the bees by fruit bloom should, if possible, be kept until the coming of white clover, so as to have them in the best possible condition, when the harvest comes."

Domestic Recipes.

Welsh Rarebit.—Toast a slice of bread, put four ounces of cheese on a plate set in the oven till melted, and pour gently on the toast. Add a little mustard, pepper and salt. To be eaten hot.

Hard Sauce.—One cup of butter, three cups of sugar, beat very hard, flavoring with lemon juice, smooth into shape with a knife dipped in cold water.

Ham and Eggs.—Take pieces of cold ham chopped very fine, and after cooking, if raw, add beaten eggs to suit your taste. Fry or bake in gem pans.

Corn Gems.—Two cups of corn meal two cups of flour, two cups of sweet milk, two eggs, three heaping teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one-half cup of butter, one-half cup of sugar. Bake in gem pans.

Oatmeal Biscuit.—Take half a pound medium oatmeal, quarter of a pound flour, one dessertspoonful of baking powder; mix with two ounces butter and half a gill of milk, made hot in a saucepan. Roll out quickly and bake at once in very thin cakes.

Stewed Mushrooms.—Slice the mushrooms into halves. Stew ten minutes in a little butter seasoned with pepper and salt and a very little water. Drain; put the mushrooms into a pie dish; break enough eggs to cover them over the top; pepper, salt and scatter bits of butter over them, stew with bread crumbs and bake until the eggs are set. Serve in the dish.

Eggs for Invalids.—Beat an egg until very light; add seasoning to taste, then steam until thoroughly warmed through but not hardened; this will take about two minutes. An egg prepared in this way will not distress even very sensative stomachs.

Prepared Currants.—To swell the currants for cakes, after they are picked, pour boiling water over them, and let them stand covered over with a plate for two minutes, drain away the water, throw the currants on to a cloth to dry them, and do not use until they are cool. Or, after being picked and washed, put them on a dish in a cool place with the doors open; turn about occasionally. Sultanas are to be prepared for cakes in the same way.

Useless Drudgery.

"Did any one ever know of a woman whose health was ruined by farm life, who didn't do a great deal of useless cooking to please herself in order to have fancy dishes, and who didn't spend a great deal of time in fixing up her girls' dresses, so that they would compare well with the neighbors "not be quite out of fashion?" We believe not often. More women are killed by devotion to silly ideas as to cookery, house cleaning, scrubbing, dusting and nonsensical dressing for the children if not for themselves, than too careful attention to what are the essentials in farm domestic life. Some men of course are tyrants, fools are beasts, but they are hardly as conspicuous in numbers as those female cranks who so often pour out their souls in the "Woman's department of some newspaper, or who so love to air their sorrow at tea-table gatherings and church sociables. More common sense is the reform needed."—Philadelphia Weekly Press.

A Dish of Young Potatoes.

After removing the skin from young potatoes, wash them well and put them in a steamer; cover closely and place over a kettle of boiling water to steam till done. Bring to a boil a sufficient quantity of cream or milk, whichever is preferred for the gravy, stir in a pinch of flour, add the desired amount of salt, pepper and butter. Heat the dish they are to be served in by dipping it in hot water. Put the steam potatoes in it, and turn the gravy over them. They are more sweet and mealy than when cooked in water. Old potatoes, also are better steamed, then mashed and seasoned; while I much prefer corn in the roasting ear steamed to that which has been boiled in water. There are a number of vegetables which preserve their flavor better when steamed; and it is frequently convenient in harvest time when kettles and stove-room are scarce, as steamers can be placed over kettles containing meat, or other vegetables.—Rural New Yorker.

Canning Green Peas and Corn.

Take 1 ounce of tartaric acid and a heaping tablespoonful of salt to 7 quarts of corn; treat beans the same way, only they must first be boiled in salt water until they will pierce easily with a fork, when corn can be added to them if one wishes to do so. They keep well in tin, glass, or stone ware. Where there is a large family take gallon jars; melt old tin cans, open or cut them open, beat them out straight, after removing the end pieces, and cut them to fit tops of jars. If the tin is rusty, take paper that has no printer's ink on it and line the under side of the tin covers. These must be a little smaller than the mouth of the jar so as to have a rim to hold wax, with which they must be sealed in. When the cans are opened for use drain off all the water, of which there must be plenty; when cooling, add a half tablespoonful of baking soda to each quart. Let it cook for a while, then try whether it needs more soda. Care must be taken not to get too much soda in. If a little of the acid that is poured off is saved, it can be used, if necessary, to kill the acid where too much is added. Season with butter, cream, and a little flour.—M. G., Toono, Ill.

Clover for Swine.

There is no more economical or better feed for pigs in summer than clover. It has been estimated on good authority that an acre of clover will grow 500 pounds of pork, and that to a certain extent it is one of the most profitable methods of using it.

Besides this it makes healthy wholesome pork, which absolute confinement in filthy pens must fail to do. Pigs grown on clover will fatten on a very small quantity of corn and leave the main portion of the corn in the crib for feed for other stock. It is not enough that the pigs have the run of the bare pasture but they should have a good clover field and not over five shotes to the acre.

Potting Strawberries.

As the strawberry season draws to a close the question of preparing beds for another year is to be discussed. Instead of the old method of setting the plants in September, the potting system is being more extensively practiced. Potted plants are obtained by sinking small earthern flowerpots in the ground under the strawberry-plants that are forming from the runners, and the roots strike down into the soil in the pot, and can be later removed with no injury whatever to the plant. The plants and soil can be easily shaken out and shipped a long distance. They need plenty of water when set. From these nearly a full crop may be obtained the following season. Beds from which early vegetables have been removed may be utilized for a strawberry bed.

Double Team Trotting.

A great deal of wonder is being expressed by the public generally at the mile in 2:15 1-2 made by Mr. Vanderbilt's pair of mares, Maud S. and Aldine, but a careful investigation of the matter is all that is needed to show that while the performance is undoubtedly a remarkably good one, it is not greater than might have been expected from the team which made it.

The fact is that for a matter of nearly twenty years not the slightest attention has been paid to double-team trotting, while the efforts to make horses go a fast mile in single harness have been unremitting. The first thing that was done in the way of record-breaking by a double team was on the 10th of May, 1862, when Mr. Robert Bonner drove Lady Palmer and Flatbush Maid a mile to road wagon in 2:26. Three days later they went two miles in 5:01 1-2, the last quarter being trotted in 33 seconds. Now at that time 2:18 1-4 was the fastest record ever made by trotter, and yet these two mares, neither of whom could beat 2:25 singly, pulled a wagon the last quarter of a two-mile heat at a 2:12 gait—a rate of speed that it is doubtful if any horse then on the turf could equal. This fact should have taught people that two horses of similar temperament and gait could speed much faster together than singly, but it does not seem to have done so, and as the driving of double teams for speed was about this time abandoned, the old fallacy that the fastest time must be looked for from a trotter in a single harness retained its sway.

But the old superstition that a trotter can go faster singly than in a double harness is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. People see horses that cannot for the life of them beat 2:25 alone, reducing those figures several seconds when driven with suitable mates, and they begin to realize that, with a division of the weight and the constant presence of a horse to incite the competition of real racing, it is but natural that a higher rate of speed should be attained. Nobody believes Aldine capable of trotting alone in 2:15 1-2, and yet Mr. Vanderbilt is authority for the statement that she kept her traces all the way during her famous mile with Maud S. In nearly every instance of remarkably fast time by teams the records made in single harness by the horses composing them have been beaten. That the "best on record" will evidently be made by a team of trotters is not, in view of recent developments, a matter of much doubt.—Breeder's Gazette.

Cross Fertilization.

Dr. E. L. Sturtevant has made some interesting trials at the Experiment Station under glass, on the effects of cross and self-fertilization on several garden vegetables. Beans which were grown in pots, where they could not receive pollen from other plants or flowers, formed pods but no seeds. In one instance a plant of the cranberry bean blossomed before there was another flower open in the greenhouse, formed a pod with eight seeds, but eight other pods were seedless. Other bean plants which could not receive cross-fertilization, bore in all with the proceeding, twenty-six pods, but only the one seed. The inference is, therefore, that cross-fertilization is extremely advantageous to the bean, and is always effected out doors in various ways. A similar result took place with the cabbage. Among the plants which were denied cross-fertilization, but which bore seeds abundantly, were the tomato, the pea and the nasturtiums. These experiments so far as limited experiments can give rules, indicate that in raising beans for seed different sorts must be kept away from each other, to prevent crossing and mixing. But many varieties of the tomato and pea may be grown in the same plot without mixing. The greatest care, however, must be used to prevent the mixing of different varieties of cabbages.—The Country Gentleman.

As Seen Behind the Scenes.

"The public has formed a wrong impression of Mary Anderson," said the gentlemanly scene shifter. "People think of her as a living iceberg. Nothing could be further from the truth. She is for all the world like a big school girl, choke full of animal spirit and overflowing with vitality. Why, I have seen her bound into wings, and in the exuberance of her frolicsome disposition jump on a man's back and make him carry her. Icebergs don't do that. She is just the sweetest, nicest, and best girl you ever met, and not a bit stuck up when you come to know her. When Louis James was playing Romeo to her Juliet, in this theater two or three years ago, he took her nose between his teeth when she stooped over to take the poison off his lips, and held her an unconscionable time. Mamma Griffin saw what he was doing, and she was in an agony of fear lest the audience should see it two. 'Just look at that devil,' she cried, coming over to where I was standing, 'he is biting Mary's nose right there on the stage. Oh, I wish I could get at him!' What a circus there was when the curtain rung down! Mary chased James all over the stage with a piece of board, and the company looked on and split their sides laughing at the sight. Gen. Sherman always liked Mary Anderson, but since the papers blasted him for kissing the chorus girls he has never gone behind the scenes. When Bob Downing joined her company he says to her: 'Now, Mary, when I play Romeo to your Juliet, I am going to make love to you with as much earnestness as though I were dead mashed on you. There will be no foolishness about my love-making. I will kiss you just as a real-sure-enough-lover would do. I want that understood.' 'All right, Bob,' she replied; 'that's just what I want you to do.' Oh, yes, Mary Anderson is an iceberg.—in your mind she is."

Personal Gossip.

Miss Whinnery, a school teacher at Benton, Ind., pointed out to Fred Plengle, one of her pupils, the folly of falling in love with her. "You're a good boy," she said, "and I would like well enough to be your mother, but I couldn't think of becoming your wife." Fred thereupon attempted suicide.

The Comte de Chambord, who is said to be dying from intestinal troubles, has been a terrible gormandizer all his life, A gentleman who saw him dining at a hotel in Bruges some years ago says that the divinely-appointed count ate two roasted chickens, two large dishes of salad, no end of vegetables, and a lot of dessert, and washed the whole down with two quarts of Burgundy. Of late years he has been so fat that locomotion was at times next to impossible with him.

An intelligent young Englishman of good family, a baronet's son, who has been investing largely in lands in Texas, was asked how it was that so many of his countrymen were buying land in this country just at this time. "I will tell you," he said. "There is a very general feeling that there will be a great change in England soon, equal to that made in the south by your civil war. Although they would laugh at the idea if you suggested it, nine out of ten men in England believe that Albert Edward, prince of Wales, will be the last king England will ever have."

An anecdote of Chopin's magical charm in music appears in the life of George Sand. It is evening in George Sand's salon. "At the piano is Chopin; and she, her son Eugene Delacroix and the Polish poet Mickiewicz sit listening whilst the composer, in an inspired mood, is extemporizing in the sublimest manner to the little circle. All are in silent rapture; when a servant breaks in with the alarm—the house is on fire. They rush to the rooms where the flames are, and succeed after a time in extinguishing them. Then they perceive that the poet Mickiewicz is missing. On returing to the salon they find him as they had left him, rapt, entranced, unconscious of the stir around him.

Many of the great English lawyers have been very uncultivated men. This was pre-eminently the case with Sir William Pollett, the most brilliant advocate of the century. He knew nothing but law, to which he gave almost all his time when a student at Cambridge.

In regard to the dismissal of Dr. Mary Walker from her position in the pension office, a Washington Star reporter who inquired at that office was informed that neither her absence nor her peculiar manner of dressing had anything to do with the dismissal. Dr. Walker was selected, among others, for dismissal because she was inefficient.

A gentleman in Paris who was in the habit of bestowing five sous daily upon a blind beggar, by mistake one day gave him a Napoleon. Afterward, discovering the error, he hunted up the beggar's residence, and called to recover his gold piece. A tidy maid opened the door of a comfortably furnished suite of apartments. Monsieur was requested to take a seat, and in a minute or two the beggar made his appearance, neatly dressed and with faultless shirt-front. The object of the visit was stated. "My clerk is just making up the day's account," he observed; "if a Napoleon has been found in the box, it shall be restored to you." The piece of gold was found, and the beggar handed it back to his visitor. As the latter was retiring, the beggar called out to him: "I beg your pardon, sir, but you have forgotten to give me the half-penny out of it."

The Ready Tongue of an "Ambassador of Commerce."

Not long ago a Hartford drummer was warned of the crusty disposition of a retailer in one of the central New York cities, and informed that while he had better call upon him, the firm would not be disappointed should he fail to transact any business. "I'll sell him," said the Hartford boy, confidently. Arriving at the city in question, he paid his first call upon the man he had been warned against. He found him sitting upon a high stool before a desk, poring over the pages of a ledger. As the drummer entered he just turned his head, took in the sample case, said: "Humph," and went on with his figures. After a lapse of five minutes he said without looking up:

"If you are a drummer I don't want to see you, so don't waste time here."

"But I'm not a drummer" was the reply.

"What in——are you, then?" inquired the retailer.

"I am an ambassador of commerce," answered the salesman, nothing daunted.

"Ambassador what! well, I can talk with you."

"If you only knew it, there's a man in one of the leading institutions in Hartford that would give $100 to talk with me."

"What sort of a man is he?"

"He's deaf and dumb."

At this response the retailer came down from his high stool and before he left the drummer had his name in his book for a handsome bill of goods.—Hartford Post.

THE VIOLIN.

Oh, fair to see!
Fashioned in witchery!
With purified curves outlining
Thine airy form, soft shining.
In mould like ripening maiden,
Budding and beauty-laden;
Thou'rt naught but wood and string,
Crowned with a carved scroll,
Yet when we hear thee sing
We deem thou hast a soul.

In some old tree
Was born thy melody—
Its boughs with breezes playing,
Its trunk to tempests swaying,
Carol of wild birds singing,
The woodman's ax loud ringing;
Light arch of forest limb
Curving thine every line,
Tones of the forest hymn
Grown ripe in thee like wine.

Lightly the bow,
As if with life aglow,
Thy mystic grace revealing,
Shall set the witches dancing;
With classic notes entrancing,
Touch deepest chords of feeling.
Thy secret caves resound
As where enchanting elves,
Flinging the echoes 'round,
Blithely disport themselves.

How wild thy glee!
How sweet thy harmony!
Murmur of light heart dreaming,
Voice of the valkyr screaming,
Song of the cascade's dashings,
Dance of auroral flashings!
O weird and wondrous thing!
Whate'er thy mood of art,
To wail or laugh or sing,
Thou'rt monarch of the heart.

THE NATURAL METHOD.

The following conversation took place one Sunday afternoon in an upper room of a German hotel in New York. On the sofa lay a violin, on the table were beer-glasses, and fondling these glasses were two young men. The conversation was in German, which I translate into English.

"You have done well to come to America, if it is for money," said the elder of the two men, fingering his heavy watch-chain, and eyeing complacently his genteel boots.

"It is money I want," answered his companion—"money to buy me leisure and freedom. It shall be the servant of my art. It is the life of a dog, this teaching. It will kill in me the creative. Five years in this land, you say, are twenty in Germany. Five years of the dog's life will buy me fifteen of the musician's.

"Oh, Carl, you lamb of an innocent!" cried the other from out a cloud of smoke. "You landed yesterday. You are not yet Americanized. I tell you this is the place to win money, and the place to find out what money is worth. There is nothing money can not do in America. You would buy leisure! You will want your money to buy good clothes, good company and a pretty wife."

Carl shrugged his shoulders in protest.

"That is what I have done. Between us two am a humbug, but I am a tolerably successful humbug. They do not suspect it. They are gullible when it comes to a bargain in the fine arts. Let your hair grow long, rate your talents high, talk as bad English as you can, and be what the ladies call 'so charmingly foreign.' There you have it."

"Ah, Friedrich, you are changed," said Carl, with a laugh and a sigh and a shrug. "And have you forsaken your art? Do you rise no higher? Are you so soon content?"

"Carl, that is all your German sentiment. You have something in you, I have always seen that. But if you mean to amount to anything you will not go mooning round with your head among the stars, talking eternally about your art. You will find yourself in a garret; that is what art does for a man in America. You have a rare chance with me for a friend; excuse my plain speech. You have come to give lessons on the piano and violin, and to play when you can. How much English do you know?"

"Enough to eat and drink and sleep."

"You could not tell a blundering girl how to [illegible] her hands properly?"

"I could quickly learn, I think. I have the English books."

"That will not do. You must take a shorter way. Let me think."

Carl walked over to the window and looked curiously out on the foreign street scene. He was a well-formed young fellow of twenty-two, with Teutonic features and complexion. His hair was tossed back from a square, broad forehead. His eyes were dark and deep-set, and would have been melancholy as the traditional artist's had not an occasional flash revealed that the boy, too, was still behind them.

Friedrich had called in his pipe to assist his meditations. "I have it!" he cried at last. "You have no objection to lying a little in a good cause? Or stay, there is no need of that. I will tell you, young man, this is your course. Find out an American music teacher, and take lessons of him for a few weeks. Pretend you do not know one note from another; make every blunder conceivable. Then store up his corrections, and I will wager six weeks of that will give you more of the English you want than six months of the dictionaries. It is the natural method, which they are all going crazy over. Sauveur would advise you as I do. Then drop in when I am giving my lessons—I give fifteen or twenty a day—a lesson of a half hour—and catch what you can then."

Carl brightened. There was a flavor of adventure about this scheme.

"It will be a very good joke on the music master," he said. "He will never guess that I have played before Liszt. It will be very mischievous, I am afraid."

"It will not hurt him," laughed Frederick. "You would better look for him as soon as you can. I must leave you now. I go to dine with the Vandenhoppers. That is what I have [illegible]."

The next day a young German was walking slowly along a shabby-genteel street and looking earnestly at each door he passed.

"Museek less-uns, museek less-uns," he murmured; but no such sign had met his eye. Ah! here at last is a window that contains the invitation, "Lessons on the Piano." He rang the door-bell quickly, and made his little speech. An elderly lady answered his ring.

"Goot-day. I come for museek less-uns," said the young man, slowly.

The old lady looked as if she thought him dangerous, and held the door but part way open.

"I haf gret luf off museek."

"Poor simple fellow!" thought the old lady. "After all, he looks harmless. Perhaps you'd better walk into the parlor," she said, loudly and distinctly. Then, calling up the narrow stairs, she said, "Emily, I wish you'd come down here—quick."

Carl looked about the little parlor. A sewing machine, a cat, some plants, a slim-legged piano, and two or three rocking chairs, more comfortable than beautiful—all of these he noticed with an increased sense of adventure. He was snapping his fingers at the cat, with a feeling that with her at least he could make himself understood. It even warmed the young stranger's heart that pussy met his advances in a friendly spirit, and, rubbing herself against his legs, purred in excellent German. Meanwhile, the lady of the house stood guard in the little entry, calling shrilly to Emily from time to time.

Emily at length appeared. She was a girl of twenty or thereabouts. Her face was rather [illegible]e than beautiful—one of the faces that do the soul justice, and perhaps in youth somewhat more than justice. Her manner was reserved but business-like. An extraordinary family, Carl thought, in which the mother goes behind the door, and leaves the daughter to transact the business. The father is plainly away teaching his music. Carl made his fine European bow, and remained standing until the young lady seated herself, and said, simply:

"You wish to take music lessons, my mother says."

"Yes, Fraulein; I haf gret luf for museek."

"Are you a beginner?" said Emily, in a clear, even voice.

"I veesh to begeen," answered Carl, with a quick gesture toward the piano.

"How many lessons a week do you wish?" asked Emily, taking out a little note book.

"Two."

"Would Tuesday and Thursday be convenient?"

"Yes, Fraulein."

"The charge will be $1 a lesson. I am Miss R. Lord. You?"

"Carl Listmann, at your service, Fraulein."

There seemed nothing further to say, and Carl took his leave. He had not dared trust English to inquire about his future instruction. Evidently the daughter was the person to act for him.

Punctually on Tuesday Carl re-appeared at 7 [illegible] effect. The thought of it did not [illegible] with the hope of seeing again [illegible] pretty American daughter, with her [illegible] ing foreign ways. Once more the cautious [illegible] in the little parlor with his cap in his [illegible]. Presently Miss Emily entered, said "Good morning," and added, "Shall we begin at once?"

He was a German, and dazed—a young German, and delighted. He sat down mechanically at the piano, while Emily was absorbed in arranging some music. She seated herself at length beside him. The young man laid his large hands on the key-board and looked at them helplessly.

"Touch the keys with the ends of you fingers, please—the ends of your fingers."

"Touch kis ends of your fingers, pliz."

"No—your wrist up."

"Wrist up—ees it so?"

"No, no; you must not lay your fingers flat on the keys. Use your finger tips. And do not use the pedal yet."

"Ach! I make neffer right. See once now."

"You hold your elbows out, sir. And now your wrists are down, and that is just as bad."

"Wreests air down, and that ees shoost as bad. Veel you say that once again, pliz?"

She repeated it; then he recited it.

"Your thumb must not be bent under the hand. Remember the elbows, please."

"Mine tumb mus' not bent unter mine hant," said Carl, laboriously.

"Ah! now your hand is all wrong again," said Emily, in the teacher's tone of studied patience.

"I am stupeed, ees it not?" sighed Carl, with well-feigned dejection.

"Excuse me," said Emily; "but I can show you best by placing your hand for you. Pardon me;" and with light finger tips she bent the unruly joints. Under her soft touch they took instantly the right curve, and she exclaimed delightedly. At this they fell flat on the keys. The wretch had discovered another foreign sensation that was highly agreeable. His stiff fingers begged in vain for a repetition. Emily drew back instantly, and threw a little more frigidity into the "sir" that she had set up as a barrier between them.

"Well, what do you make out of him?" said her mother, looking up from her sewing as Emily entered the room. "Has he any wits? I thought he looked as if he'd got out from somewhere that first day he came."

Emily, flushed and excited, walked rapidly up and down the room. The cool little business woman had taken her departure with the new pupil.

"I don't know what to make of it, mother—I don't know what to make of it. Why should he have come to me?"

"Why, you are a very good music teacher, I'm sure," said her mother, threading her needle.

"I don't understand him. He is poor, but he is not a laboring man. His hands are large and strong, but supple and delicate as any musician's. I shan't have to keep him long on finger exercises, though he is very dull about some things. But I don't understand his hands."

"Perhaps he's a dry goods clerk," suggested her mother, briskly.

"And his face, too," Emily went on, half in soliloquy. "It is the real artist's face. I have seen pictures of such."

"Don't you think you'd better sit down?" said Mrs. Lord. "You'll be tired. You've got more lessons to give to-day."

"Yes, the McFarland twins," sighed Emily, and went wearily to put on her hat and shawl.

Thursday brought her new pupil again.

"You teach goot," he said. "Hear me already once;" and he played the last lesson faultlessly. "You will giff anoder? More deefficult."

In spite of the blunders, Emily's pupil made great progress. She told him so with a mixture of reserve and warmth.

"You play a leetle," said he. "I vish to hear you," rising from the piano.

Emily said not a word, but sat down and played a Beethoven andante with a strange sense of exaltation. The young man stood with arms folded and bent head, his deep eyes fixed upon her.

"You haf the soul," he said, simply, when she had finished. She looked at him quickly, her eyes filled with tears. "I come again Tuesday," he said, and took his departure.

Carl dropped in that night at Friedrich Heller's fireside. The youngest Heller had the measles, and Mrs. Friedrich was upstairs in attendance.

"A good joke that was, Carl, your stumbling upon that pretty little music teacher. Now, that never would have happened to me. I never had an adventure in my life. I met my wife at a ball, met her at half a dozen more, called on her a few times and married her. How long is your joke to last?"

"I learn the phrases quickly," answered Carl. "It is a horror of a piano."

"But what of her? What of her, eh?"

"She teaches well, I think. She has not a bad method."

"Is that all? Is that all?"

"She has a mother who opens the door, and who sews. They are not alike."

Carl had wandered over to the piano, and idly fingered a few bars of the Beethoven that Emily had played. Suddenly he came back and stood before the fire.

"That is a base trick I am playing, Friedrich. I am going to have done with it."

"Nonsense, Carl. You like it, you know that well."

Carl turned and looked at the fire and laughed a big boyish laugh. He shrugged his shoulders and threw out his hands as if denials were useless.

"Did you give that letter to Pfeiffer?" said Friedrich, abruptly.

"Yes; he heard me play. He placed me among the first violins. I play with the orchestra three times next week."

"When you are ready for piano lessons tell me. I am turning them away every day. I am the fashion, you know."

"I do not want many," said Carl; "I want only those who are gifted."

Friedrich Heller roared with laughter. "And what will you say to the magnificent Fraulien who has about as much music in her as a hand-organ, but who will pay you $5 a lesson, and adore you beside."

"I will say, Fraulien, you haf mistaken your gift. I vill not rob you of your money."

"Carl, what a precious young fool you are."

And very soon Carl said good night.

The gallery nearest the roof in the Academy of Music began slowly to be filled long before the seats below were occupied. Among the early comers were Emily and her friend Angie Bowles. Emily sank into her seat and closed her eyes wearily.

"You're tired to-night," said her friend.

"It's the McFarland twins," sighed Emily. "But I must forget them here. I can shut my eyes and fancy that this music comes to me through the open gates of heaven. Oh, the hard living there'll be before I really hear it—if I'm ever good enough. That sounds like grumbling; but you understand, Angie; you and I don't have to translate to each other."

Angie seemed to be reminded of something. "Don't you find it very hard to talk with that German pupil of yours?"

Emily was silent an instant, and then said, quietly; "We are both good at guessing, and he is learning English fast. We always understand each other. Hush! the music is going to begin."

The gallery settled into a reverent silence. At Emily's elbow sat a rough-handed man, with stooping shoulders, and a rusty hat between his knees. He leaned forward with lips apart and eager eyes, for this was the feast-day of his hard-working week. Across the aisle were a young couple, the girl with a kindled face, the young man with a look of good-natured endurance, which broadened into an admiring smile as from time to time he stole a glance at his companion. Here was a rude-featured lad strangely softened and transformed, so beyond himself that he forgot to be ashamed to show his feeling.

Emily looked about her. "Poor hungry souls! I wish they could have their fill. And the people in the streets, every one with his trouble or his sin, I should like to gather them in, and soothe and strengthen and purify them with free, priceless music. And here, to clamber to this gallery costs a poor man's whole day's earnings. Cheap music is New York's crying need."

"You ought to go to Europe," said her companion, admiringly. "You ought to study in Germany."

"It is what I look toward devoutly, prayerfully. That is the consummation of every teacher's life. There can be nothing afterward but heaven."

"It's a shame you can't go. But then Europe won't run away," said Angie, comfortably.

"My life will."

The music began again, at first distant and tremulous, then broad and strong, sweeping on steadily to the highest note of exaltation. The creeping, crawling troubles of this earth had vanished; life seemed clear and lofty, and heaven easy to attain. It was a fine mood that is very fragile. Suddenly Emily started, and, clutching her friend's hand, leaned forward.

"What do you see?" whispered Angie. "Are you dizzy?"

"I thought—I thought I saw some one I know," answered Emily, her face a shade paler. [illegible] far from here, and I have no [illegible] dizzy. I think something [illegible] lately." And she closed her eyes; but only to see [illegible] of the orchestra. "It was—but of course it wasn't. And yet— Why, the idea was absurd. But still—" Da capo, da capo, da capo. [illegible] day."

He sat down at the piano, and Emily stood beside him. As the young musician struck the keys her nerves vibrated to the touch. She felt a strange subjection to the influence that made it an effort to speak or act.

"You are making remarkable progress. You will soon play better than I can," she said, in a constrained voice.

He played on, neither looking at notes nor at piano, but steadily into her face. She moved to the end of the piano, and called the cat to her.

"And you air glad?" Carl continued.

"I shall be very proud of you. You are the only pupil I am proud of," said Emily, unhappily.

"Ees it so?" said Carl with compassion. "Air they stupeed? Haf they no museek in the soul?"

Emily laughed bitterly.

"Your life ees not light," he said gently.

"It's all I expect. It's more than I've had any right to expect. I came near being a dress-maker."

The young German said nothing, but still fingered the keys and looked at her.

"You say I shall one day play better than you? Vill you then turn and I teach you? That would be a little joke, ees it not? to change our place."

If Emily was displeased she said nothing in reply, but continued: "You should go to a great teacher. I am for children and poor people. You should go to Friedrich Heller. I am nothing. I can appreciate; that is my one gift. I am nobody. Why did you ever come to me?" she said, passionately, and turned her head away.

There was a dead silence. Suddenly, without a word of warning, the young musician touched the keys with the hand of a master, and dashed into a brilliant rhapsody of Liszt.

Emily darted from the piano to the middle of the room, her face filled with dismay. She stood there, trembling from head to foot, till Carl, without stopping, looked round upon her. She was pale and quivering with anger and consternation. She met his look, flushed a painful crimson, and bursting into tears, rushed from the room.

Carl stumbled out of the house in an agony of shame at his brutality. It even added to his offense, he thought, that it had been committed with entire innocence. That he had had no foresight of these disastrous consequences he felt proved not only his masculine density, but the unintelligent cruelty of the dumb brute. He subjected himself to every form of self-castigation, regretting every moment that Emily could not know what he was suffering. The next day he rang at 7 Brick street, and the mother guardedly opened the door, thrust out a bit of paper, and said:

"My daughter don't expect you to come any more, she says. I've made out our bill. I s'pose you can send us the money by to-morrow."

In the meanwhile, thanks to Friedrich Heller's influence, Carl Listmann proposed. He played at one or two concerts, and was at once adopted as a New York favorite. It was understood in the highest circles that young Listmann, the new pianist, gave but few lessons, and these only to persons of decided natural gifts. Whether the highest circles were right or not, it is a fact that Carl worked night and day.

"What did I tell you?" said his friend. "Who is more anxious to make money than young Carl Listmann? One does not hear so much about his art these times."

Carl looked gloomily at his friend. He gave a laugh, out of which the boyishness had gone completely. He said nothing, but in his heart he answered that work is a desperate remedy, which must kill or cure, and either result he would welcome.

It happened that Carl was one morning giving a lesson to a merchant princess on Fifth avenue. It must be acknowledged that he had been sadly false to his ideals when he accepted this pupil. The lesson proceeded with many affectations of humility and rapture on the one side, and with dogged endurance on the other, when the sound of another piano in the distance caught the ear of the young German.

"Anoder I hear."

"Oh yes," said Miss McFarland, vivaciously. "Don't listen to that. That is the nursery piano. The twins are taking their lesson."

"The tweens!" echoed Carl; "the McFarland tweens!"

Instantly two things connected themselves in his mind, connected themselves so vividly that it is to be feared his eager pupil found him very unresponsive during the remainder of the lesson. By and by the distant piano ceased, and there was a light step in the hall. Carl glanced at his watch, and pleaded unusual haste that day. As the stately hall door closed he had his hand upon it, and as the twins' music teacher reached the sidewalk he was by her side.

"Can you neffer forgif me?" he pleaded.

The girl started and turned pale. Something seemed to have gripped her heart, and then as suddenly to have let go. A hot, agonizing flush mounted slowly to her very hair.

"Can you neifer forgif me?" the voice in her ear repeated. "I am unhappy always."

"I shall never," said the proud woman, "forgive—you," said the tremulous girl.

Emily could not trust her unsteady voice to shape another syllable. Carl cursed his lack of English, and they walked on in silence.

"How can I say to you!" exclaimed Carl, desperately. "It was to learn English that I might teach again. It was wrong, but oh! it was a joy. And it was a base thing to display to you my music. But it was a rash thought. I did repent the next moment. But you did neffer let me say it. And I have suffered. It ees because I luf thee."

Emily gave a little gasp. Carl burst into a torrent of German, which she understood.

"Thou dost understand," he cried, joyfully. "Thou will forgif, and thou will luf me! Thou will forgif me?"

"I will forgive you," she murmured, with her eyes on the ground.

"And thou will luf me?"

She looked up into his face.

Old Wills in Fairfax Court House.

Washington Post: The will of Washington, though written at the close of the last century, might be called one of the modern records of the Fairfax county court house. It is the first entry in "Liber H," and the seven preceding books are filled with wills recorded as far back as 1742. The books are made of parchment and bound with leather. The records are carefully written, or rather printed, each letter being made separate and carefully. The ink is as black and clear as though used yesterday. After each will is an inventory of the personal property of the deceased, taken by a commission appointed by the court, a custom which prevails to the present day. Let us look for a moment at the inventory of the estate of Thomas Arbuthnot, gent, who died somewhere about the middle of the last century. Seven white servants, valued at £8 apiece, head the list and appear to have been the most valuable part of the estate. Seven brass candlesticks and a teapot was appraised at 1£. What imaginations of old-time gossip center around "six old arm-chairs and a tea table," which were valued at £1 8s. Other items in the estate of Mr. Arbuthnot were "a pair of money scales and weights, a still and worm, two cases of old pistols, twelve shurts, two old wiggs and a silver-hilted sword." The record of Dennis McCarty's personal property covers several pages and presents a total value of £1,441 2s. 8d. In this estate fifty-one negroes were included, the men being appraised from £30 to £35, the women nearly as much, and the boys and girls from £10 to £25. Queer names, such as Songo, Boss and Hercule, had the negro slaves, while Joan, Sabine and Rhoda were some of the titles given to the girls. A warming-pan, a case of pistols and holsters, candle-snuffers and firetongs and shovels were some of the ancient articles which belonged to George Harrison, gentleman. John Hampton's inventory shows that he owned, among other things, one "neagro" man, ten "sider" (spelled elsewhere "cyder") casks, "one sett of Iyron wedges," two suits of "close" and "small trifles." All the wills begin with a redundance of phraseology, somewhat like the following, which in the original is totally without punctuation.

"I, Josias Clapham of Fairfax county, am sick and weary of body, but, thanks be to God, of sound and perfect memory and understanding, do make, will and constitute this my full commition of my sins and Joyful reserxtion and Eternall happiness, threw the merrits and meditation of Jesus Christ, my savour; my body I recommend to the Earth from whence it come, to be deacently buried at the discretion of my executor."

LOVE'S ENVY.

I am envious of the wind
When it blows
Kisses to you, oh, my fair!
I am envious of the rose
That you wear
In the tresses of your hair.

I am envious of your glove,
Or your fan,
Or the jewel at your breast.
But I envy most the man
Whom you love
For the passing moment best.

A CRICKET IN MY ROOM.

(AFTER LEIGH HUNT.)

Mary, what was that you said?
"A cricket is a sign of dread,
And shortly here shall some one de
Be lying, certain."

You make a horrid Banshee of
My troubadour who sues for love,
And all the while is gay enough
Behind the curtain.

Now shall I fright you from your wits,
And tear your threat to frolic bits,
And laugh at you, as well befits
An erring preacher.

By saying this before you go:
"Hail, darling omen, weal or woe;
Speak, prophesying, I pray you so:
Chirp, little creature!"

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

The Beautiful Women of Seville.

Letter to the Boston Courier: Any one who has once enjoyed them can never forget the long, sunny days of Seville, the delicious, dreamy atmosphere, the evening walks through orange groves and island gardens, along the banks of the beautiful Guadalquiver, fringed with accacias and willows, reflecting in its silent depths the soft lights and the deep shadows of the Western sky; the glory of the setting beyond the green plains and the distant palms, gilding the tops of the tall masts that rise from the bosom of the river like slender church spires, and the beautiful Moorish Giralda in the city and the great Tower d'Oro by the river side, and flooding the earth with a golden radiance; and then the slow, solemn coming up of the great yellow moon over the orange gardens and the palm trees behind the stately palace of the Duc de Montpensier; and the sweet, pensive mystery of the nights, when the rustle of the palms and the fragrance of the orange blossoms and the soft rhythmical plash of the fountain in the patio beneath one's window mingle with one's dreams; and one half wakes at the hourly peal of the cathedral bell to hear the sereno chanting in musical cadence the hour of the night, and the comforting assurance that "all is well" and the "weather is fair." It all seems like a beautiful dream; and yet never was dream so real. The dress of the Sevilleans—especially of the women—if somewhat less picturesque than is found among their cousins of the Orient, is far better adapted for the exhibition of beauty of form and feature. The ungraceful veils with which the Mohammedan Mauresque conceals all her beauty but that of the dark lustrous eyes, in the Andalusian Mauresque has been etherialized to a scarf of soft clinging lace which, encircling the face and falling in graceful folds about the throat and shoulders, only heightens the beauty it may have once been intended to conceal. The plainest of countenances is softened and idealized by this sort of a veil; the beautiful becomes bewitching. No shapeless jacket and baggy trousers and clumsy slippers hide or distort the exquisite beauty of these lithe and slender forms, the graceful droop of the shoulders, the high arched instep of the little foot, or the supple grace of carriage. These small feet of the Andalusian, so much besung, are no figment of the poet's brain. It is one of the first things a stranger observes, and is particularly noticeable in the children, whose dainty little feet seem scarcely staunch enough to support the plump little legs above them; and the shops where children's shoes are sold one might easily take for an emporium of doll's outfits. Nor has the romancist very much exceeded the limits of truth in his rhapsodies on Andalusian beauty. Plainness of feature, except among the old and hard-worked, is the exception. The beauty of the women, if not of the highest type, is of a very gratifying quality; but the beauty of the children seems something almost miraculous.

Bad Things on the Beach.

An old maid writes from Long Branch: "The Fourth of July was a splendid day here, and there were 900 guests at the West End hotel. The bathing was delightful and hundreds went into the water, the temperature being 71 deg. The sun shone hot upon the sandy beach, and the summer-houses and platforms were covered with spectators. There issued from a bath-house a female thusly attired: Black silk stockings reaching to her thighs, and a tight-fitting red bodice without sleeves, and a very short tunic of red belted with black, and a black border around the tunic. Her arms were bare to her shoulder and her head was bare. She had two male attendants, who were bare-armed, bare-breasted, and bare-legged. With a swagger the female walked through the hot sand, and, after allowing the spectators to view her standing for twenty minutes, she sat down on the sand, and the men did the same. For full half an hour they sat browning themselves in the sun and warming up for the bath. The tide was out and the water shallow for a great distance; the three figures walked on and on until they reached the large breakers, and then she vaulted through the surf like a circus-rider going through the paper balloons. The trio performed many circus feats for the amusement of the large audience. Then they came out and sat on the sands; one of the man stretched himself out and the female proceeded to bury him; she soon had him covered from neck to toes, and then stood over him kicking the sand in a higher heap. Two young girls chased each other out of the water, and in conspicuous bathing suits wrestled on the beach until one succeeded in throwing down the other, then she laid full length on her, and tried to force sand in her mouth. The under girl struggled and shrieked, but the one on top held her down until she filled her mouth with sand. This gave desperate strength to the under one, and she succeeded in getting her opponent down and serving her with the same repast, then released her, and both ran into the water. These girls only thought of having a bit of fun, but, before this era, would modest girls romp in such attire before such a promiscuous crowd? Another girl came out of the water and threw herself, face downward, on the sand and kicked up her heels in the air. Formerly young ladies protected their complexions from tan and sunburn; now the tom-boys and hoydens try to brown their arms, hands and faces. After two hours in the water and on the hot sands they are as red as their dresses, their parasols, and their ribbons.

Mirrors.

The place of the mirror, in the various styles of decoration now adopted in our houses, is as a rule subordinate. The large looking-glass is discarded in favor of a number of small looking-glasses of various sizes and shapes, placed in different portions of the room and at various angles, reflecting the light and giving to the apartment the illusion of broken reflections. Frames are of carved wood. In many cases they are made with shelves and recesses for the reception of bric a brac, and we have seen large mirrors enshrined in painted tapestry harmonizing with the general coloring of the room. Plush and velvet frames are ornamented with the needle and painted upon, and the old habit of painting on the glass has been revived. A looking-glass given to a bride was set in a frame five inches deep, covered with white velvet, on the corners of which sprays of pink hawthorn, delicately painted, seemed negligently thrown. On the glass itself lay a small branch bright with rosy blossoms and tiny leaves. Another mirror was framed in blue velvet, on which was painted a garland of oxeyed daisies; daisies and grasses fell in clusters on the side of the mirror. Some blush roses, with their leaves painted on a black frame and on the glass, formed another effective mirror. Water lilies and their leaves enshrined a looking glass as they might have lain on a silvery pool. To paint on glass you must proceed exactly as you would for painting in oil upon canvas. Those who can rely on their draughtmanship need not outline their design. The safer plan is to trace it on the glass with a lithographic pencil. The color should be laid on thickly, and the masses should be kept broad and effective. Sable brushes must be used for the glass; a stiff bristle or hog hair for the frames, covered with plush, in order to rub the color well into the stuff.

Ruskin's Girls and Lovers.

"The experience of most thoughtful persons will confirm me in saying," remarks Mr. Ruskin, "that extremely good girls usually die young. Little Nells and May Queens fly from the smoke and stir of this dim spot which men call earth to the regions mild of calm and serene air." In illustration of this Mr. Ruskin tells in his own charming way a pathetic little story of a sea captain's daughter—"the most beautiful girl of [illegible] English-Greek type, [illegible] and bright [illegible] pure color— [illegible] herself with a youth whom, with [illegible] learned the truth, and she never recovered from the blow. She wandered about wistfully for some years, and then died of a rapid decline. Upon this pathetic tale Mr. Ruskin hangs some curious advice as to the proper conduct of love and courtship. To begin with, he lays down the principle that a girl's proper confidant is her father, not her mother. "What she is not inclined to tell her father should be told to no one, and in nine cases out of ten not thought of by herself. I believe few fathers, however wrong-headed or hard-hearted, would fail of answering the habitual and patient confidence of their child with true care for her." Secondly, Mr. Ruskin, in his usual peremptory fashion, lays down the following ideal law of courtship, which has, perhaps, even less chance of getting itself practically realized than his first canon, that a girl should tell all her love affairs to her father: "When a youth is fully in love with a girl, and feels that he is wise in loving her, he should at once tell her so plainly, and take his chance bravely with other suitors. No lover should have the insolence to think of being accepted at once, nor should any girl have the cruelty to refuse at once, without severe reasons. If she simply doesn't like him she may send him away for seven years or so—he vowing to live on cresses and wear sackcloth meanwhile, or the like penance; if she likes him a little, or thinks she might come to like him in time, she may let him stay near her, putting him always on sharp trial to see what stuff he is made of, and requiring, figuratively, as many lion skins or giant's heads as she thinks herself worth. The whole meaning and power of true courtship is probation, and it ought not to be shorter than three years, at least; seven is to my mind the orthodox time. And these relations between the young people should be openly and simply known, not to their friends only, but to everybody who has the least interest in them; and a girl worth anything ought always to have half a dozen or so suitors under love for her. There are no words strong enough to express the general danger and degradation of the manners of mob courtship as distinct from these which have become the fashion—almost the law—in modern times; when in a miserable confusion of candle-light, moonlight and lime-light—and anything but a daylight—in indecently attractive and insanely expensive dresses, in snatched moments, in hidden corners, in accidental impulses and dismal ignorance, young people smirk and ogle and whisper, and whimper and sneak and stumble and flutter and fumble and blunder into what they call love—expect to get whatever they like the moment they fancy it, and are continually in the danger of losing all the honor of life for a folly, and all the joy of it by an accident."

A Lover's Stratagem.

There is a good deal of surprise in Jersey City over the romantic marriage of B. Cliff Tunison, a young lawyer and son of a prominent Methodist preacher, to Miss Belle Barton of York, Pa., who has been visiting friends on Sipp avenue, Jersey City heights. She met young Tunison a short time ago and he fell in love with her. He learned that she was under engagement of marriage to a wealthy resident of York, who was many years her senior. He was the choice of her parents, and she yielded to them. The wedding was to have taken place on Wednesday last. Tunison met Miss Barton a few days before the time set for her departure for home, told her his love and was accepted. They then determined to be married. The young lady said her aunt, Mrs. Sayres, would arrive on Monday to take her home. On Sunday of last week Mr. Tunnison called upon Miss Barton, intending to invite her out for a walk, when they would have the marriage ceremony performed. His plan, however, was spoiled by the unexpected arrival of Miss Barton's aunt. The young lady and her aunt were to start for home the following day. Tunison communicated with Barton and told her to leave the car in the railroad depot by the door opposite to that through which her aunt would leave it, as he had a ruse which he hoped would be successful, in decoying the aunt away. When Mrs. Sayres and her niece had taken their seats in a car a messenger boy entered and handed Mrs. Sayres a letter. She hurried out, saying she would return before the train left, and charged her niece not to leave the seat. As soon as she was out of the depot Tunison and Miss Barton hurried to the ferry and went to New York. When Mrs. Sayres returned to the depot the train was moving out. She telegraphed to have her niece wait at Philadelphia and then started by the next train, expecting to find Miss Barton waiting there. Before she arrived at the Philadelphia depot a message had been sent her, notifying her that her niece had become Mrs. Tunison. The couple, on coming to this city, drove to the residence of the Rev. Mr. Simpson, in Twenty-fifth street, and were married.

A Beautiful Lunatic.

On Thursday, Messrs. George Clarke, Tom Whiffen, Prof. Lemoyne, of crematory fame, Col. Frankau, one Daniel Frohman, and several others of the Rajah troupe at the Madison Square theater, visited Blackwell's Island with Commissioner Hess. While they were in ward 3 of the lunatic asylum a remarkably pretty girl threw her arms around Mr. Clarke's neck and sobbed: "Oh, my husband! oh, my husband! Take me away! Take me home!"

The nurses vainly tried to recall her to herself. Clarke turned pale. Her sobbings increased. He gently unwound her arms from his neck, saying, in soothing tones: "That's all r-r-right, my good gyrl. Be cawlm, be cawlm."

He gently backed himself into the hall and then ran like a deer. He was stopped by the Hon. Arthur D. Williams, who urged him to go back and humor the poor girl, assuring him that his flight had excited all the lunatics in the ward. He turned back as white as a sheet, the perspiration trickling from his brow. An affecting scene followed. He assured the girl that he would see that she was released. Her paroxysms increased, and she clung to him with more fervor than ever. The Rajah troupe were deeply affected. All the ladies sobbed. Then Whiffin murmured, "What a pity," and one Daniel Frohman wept aloud.

Finally the two nurses got the girl under control. She bade the actors adieu, after Clarke had promised her some ice cream. As the party reached the open air, Clarke moralized thus: "Poor gyrl, poor gyrl! We call ourselves actors, but there is no acting after all that approaches reality." The incident was the topic of commiserating conversation during the afternoon. The Rajah troupe have sent the unfortunate girl baskets of fruit and other delicacies.

They were eaten by Mrs. McGlynn, an instructress of the lunatics in music and other accomplishments. At Commissioner Hess's suggestion she availed herself of this opportunity to give the actors and actresses, including one Daniel Frohman, a lesson in their own art. From the inception of the farce to its ending the real lunatics in the ward were in ecstacies. They seemed to thoroughly understand the situation.

Illness When Traveling.

To be prepared for sudden illness in traveling is most important, especially at this season of the year when people are liable to be taken suddenly sick. If one is away from home under such circumstances without any way of getting needed remedies immediately, a few simple things may prove of great value. Some way of heating water, milk, etc., is most useful. In many places, especially in the country, there is no fire kept up after the work is finished and it often requires so much time and work to get hot water or hot things that it is considered more trouble than it is worth, and so people often go without when the things are really needed. There is sold now at most hardware stores a small alcohol heater, which is perfectly safe to use if the directions are followed out. It consists of a shallow pan filled with asbestos, covered with wire, and an iron frame which closes so that the whole thing can be packed in a small compass. The asbestos acts like a sponge and holds the alcohol which is poured into it. There is a place above the flame to set a tin cup, or, if it is desirable, to heat flannels, a flat pan can be heated over it on which the flannels can be laid. No time or trouble is required more than lighting a lamp, and the only precaution to be used is not to fill the little pan when it is hot or close it until it has cooled. In cases of cramp or when little children are ill the convenience of such an arrangement is worth many times its value, and no family should travel without something of the kind. Many a sudden attack has been relieved by the application of hot fomentations or the taking of something hot to drink. The simple remedies used in every family should never be left at home, either the little pill box or the mustard leaves, camphor, [illegible] a place somewhere. [illegible] or an attack of indigestion if it is neglected, and it stands every one in hand to have a few simple remedies, at least, with them in traveling.

How Dr. Mary Walker Looks.

Washington Letter: Picture in your mind a form of small stature dressed in black, Prince Albert coat and silk tile, with pantaloons that fit no better than those of Alexander H. Stephens; a delicate little cane carried awkwardly in the hand; small, wrinkled face, eyes also small and almost lusterless, and hair that looks as though it was chopped off rather than clipped by the tonsorial artist—and you have Dr. Mary Walker. The wrinkled face and "crow's feet" about the eyes show that the doctor is not so young as she used to be, but no signs of grayness are noticeable in her hair. Her mission at present seems to be in the direction of securing for herself an increase of the pension which a grateful republic awarded her some time ago for her labors upon the battle-fields of the late war. She is a frequent visitor at the different departments in some cause or other, and when some poor official protests audibly against her habit of calling early and often, principally often, she is always ready with a lecture upon the courtesies and amenities of official life. With all her fondness for male attire, she does not take to the overcoat. Should you meet her on the street some cold day you will find a heavy shawl protects her from the icy breezes, but when she enters any office or store she never fails to remove her tall hat and shawl. Many times I have seen her in the crowds of men that send in their cards to members of the house, disdaining to wait in the ladies' reception room, but she removes her hat all the same. The doctor went into a carpet store the other day, and asked to see some new styles of carpets. The clerk unrolled almost everything that had been received for many weeks, but the doctor could find nothing to please her æsthetic taste, and she finally excused herself by saying that she had merely called to inspect the goods for a sick friend. "Now, look here, doctor," said the clerk, "that is the two hundred and ninetieth time that gag has been played on me. This sick friend business won't work any longer;" but the doctor moved out of sight as calmly as does the setting sun, and said nothing.

Five Thousand Dollars a Pound.

In his last letter to the Atlanta Constitution, "Bill Arp" says: As a rule the girls show too much anxiety to marry. They are too sweet on the boys. They ought to stand off and look reserved and precious, and put on Jerusalem airs and say young man, you don't know who you are fooling with. I'm a treasure, I am. I weigh 115 pounds and am worth $1,000 a pound. Well, they are. A good, nice, healthy girl who can make her own dress and get up a good supper for company, and is not ashamed to wait on the table while they are eating, is just worth about $1,000 a pound. But that is nothing compared with what they will be worth. Why, Mrs. Arp has cut out and made up at least 2,000 garments of one sort and another. She has sewed 500,000 stitches, and patched and darned and washed faces and feet and combed hair innumerable. She has tied up 500 sore toes and cut fingers and burns and bruises, and kissed away a thousand tears. She has watched 'em by night and by day, and keeps on watching; and right now, while I am writing on my piazza, she is looking away up the big road and says; "I'm afraid something will happen to them boys; they are too little to go on by themselves." There are two little nephews here just out of school, and they and Carl have all got a horse or a colt apiece, and have gone off on a "scursion," and I call 'em the infantry cavalry, and tell Mrs. Arp it is all right, but she sits here sewing with her specs on and over and anon looks up the road and says, "Those children have overstaid their time. I'm afraid something has happened." If they don't come back soon I know that I will have to start after 'em, for that is always the way. Mrs. Arp is worth at least $5,000 a pound, and she weighs right smart and keeps a getting heavier. I am rich, I am. I feel wealthy whenever I look at her.

The Girl on a Tricycle.

The girl on a tricycle has already made her appearance at the summer resorts. As observed at Newport, she sat between the two wheels, which were connected by a short axle-tree, on a kind of saddle, astride of it, but not so circumstanced as to make divided garments necessary, as in riding horseback, man fashion. Her feet reached down to treadles, and her hands were employed in steering by means of a device connected with a low front wheel. Her posture was not that of sitting, however, but her figure was suspended nearly perpendicular, and her legs were moved a great deal like those of a horse afflicted with springhalt, or a swimmer treading water. Her knees came up high, with an action more productive of good exercise than of grace. And yet she was "a symmetrical and pleasing traveler." The prescribed costume is soft, thin flannel, with a blouse waist and skirt just reaching to the gaiter tops. It is obvious that the latter level could not be steadily maintained, in view of the high treading required to work the tricycle, without some special modification of the garment. This want has been supplied by taking an idea from the equestrian habit. "Lengthwise of the skirt in front two gussets are set in points, when the knees will protrude into them in rising."

A Memorable Smile.

The description of a woman's smile, says the New York Commercial Advertiser, is said to be taken from a Hawaiian romance, but there is a certain something about it calculated to create several doubts in the mind of the reader: "Crouched at the foot of the old board fence that hid the humble dwelling from the sharp scrutiny of passing vehicles and men. She was fat and of large limb, and her round, broad cheeks glowed with the rich warmth of the chestnut. Her long-lashed eyelids dropped over her lustrous eyes, and the thick tresses of her blue-black hair shaded her neck and bosom. Suddenly some passing object attracted her attention, and the dark pupils of her eyes expanded in amused surprise. Her rich, red lips parted, and there flashed upon the landscape two rows of beautiful white teeth. Slowly her mouth opened wider and wider. Deeper grew the dimples on her bronzed cheeks. Brighter danced the sunbeams in her eyes, until a stray ray, darting through the foliage of an overhanging bough, illuminated the deep cavern of her mouth, bringing into view the back of her head. Then, seeing the gaze intently upon her, she shut her jaw, and darkness fell upon the scene."

The "Darned Net Craze."

"It is a coarse lace work wrought on lace netting with darning or knitting cotton, though much of it is done in linen floss, especially in the West, and it can be made as fine as the finest lace in the market. Still, for the most part, the numbers 8 and 10 are the cotton used, the lace netting being bought by the yard and of a size of mesh to suit the cotton. The materials are not dear, but the working of them up into the figures and patterns that please the fancy is difficult and tedious, and the finished work on this account, and the time occupied in completing it, comes rather high. A great many patterns are produced, but those known as the star and fern leaf and the five, three, two stitch seem to be the most favored. One lady of this city has fifty different patterns worked by herself, and one most liked in general—a vine pattern—is the one most easily learned and worked."

A Woman's Purse Pocket.

The woman who found herself the other day on board an eastern-bound train, without pocketbook or money, solemnly averred that it is never safe to carry valuables and all the money one has in a purse or hand-bag. An inside pocket of some kind is almost indispensable in traveling. An easy way to make one, and perhaps as good a way as any, is to take a piece of cloth about eight inches square, of the same material as the balmoral skirt, and sew it on the sides and lower edge to the front of the skirt ten inches below the band. Another piece three inches wide is fastened just above to form a lid. This buttons with two or three buttons and makes a pocket out of which nothing can fall and which is flat, a safe place for extra money, etc.

Plumage.

The latest English novelty in the way of lawn tennis dresses is a clever adaptation of a Russian peasant's dress. The peasant bodice is made of dark blue velvet, with shoulder straps, the chemisette and long sleeves being formed of white linen, prettily worked with Russian embroidery, [illegible]

It was never before so easy to renovate the worn front of a dress. Lace jabots, vests, plastrons, plaits, puffed and pleated; wide bands of embroidery put around the neck like an Elizabethean ruff, and extending straight down the front of the dress, with the edges meeting in the center, and fichus of all kinds are all popular. Handsome white mull ties may be utilized, provided they are wide enough, by trimming the sides with lace as much like that on the ends as possible, only it need not be so deep. The tie, so trimmed, should be doubled so that the lace on both ends will show, and caught at the neck to fall in a full shell where the dress collar meets. The doubled end is then to be either tucked into the belt of the dress or caught under a rosette of ribbon or bouquet of flowers, the portion between neck and belt forming a puffed plastron of lace and mull.

Two very pretty styles of skirt for stout figures may be made in any material. The first is pleated all the way down in flat box-pleats, with side pleating underneath at the foot; short and very flat pleated drapery over the hips and across the front, arranged in drooping loops at the back. The other dress has two kilt pleatings reaching to the knee in front, and shawl overskirt with point a little to the left, three hollow pleated flounces at the back, and a flowing bow of ribbon by way of tournure.

As many as seventy yards of fine lace are sometimes arranged on a tea gown. Ladies who have good lace, in mantillas, shawls, flounces and berthes are to be congratulated. The transparent lace mantles are made over black net, and trimmed with jet motifs and satin loops. A Spanish lace mantilla is arranged as a mantle or a tablier, and a shawl has the point in front, and the ends draped among folds of satin or gauze at the back below the pointed bodice.

Among the features of the season is to be chronicled the revival of vests—not such as are simulated by a plastron laid upon the waist, but real waistcoats, made in exact imitation of those worn by men, and such as ladies wore a quarter of a century ago. Over this is worn a little jacket with loose fronts and turned-down collars, fitting closely in the back, and with tight sleeves.

The Russian chemise, Bernhardt blouse, or whatever one may call the loose bag front, grows more and more in favor, and is probably among the coming styles of the fall. It is usually worn under a jacket, as a shirt, but frequently, also, takes the form of a puffed plastron. It is becoming only to slight figures, and is especially appropriate for misses.

The old fashion of full pinked ruches is revived, and many are used; in some cases so thick that the trimming has almost the effect of a heavy cord. Where several shades are used, or the ruching is of chene silk, the effect is very much that of a rope of flowers edging the garment.

Nun's veilings and albatross, and soft summer cashmeres in evening tints, are favorite costumes for hotel hops, while fancy woolens of all sorts, summer camel's hairs, silk and wool mixtures, thin cashmeres and French flannels are more than fashionable for all occasions.

A velvet skirt in black, dark brown or navy blue is a most useful adjunct to a lady's wardrobe, since it may be worn with a variety of overdresses. Velvet jackets, also, are stylish for wear over light dresses, especially when such dresses are made with puffed plastrons.

This is a velvet season, and much velvet is used for trimming. The best dressmakers use many loops of velvet ribbon, but no ends, since the latter are apt to curl up and soon grow unsightly.

Letters from Paris say that never has lace been used in greater profusion or variety. Cream, pale coffee and ecru vie in favor with black, pale salmon and all sorts of yellows, reds, browns, etc.

Figured materials require less trimming than plain ones, which are very prettily trimmed with embroidery or bead work put on in stripes all the way down.

The back drapery on most dresses is now sewed to a separate band at the top, and fastens on to the waistband in such wise that it covers the placket underneath.

Lace flounces, by themselves, or alternating with material in front, are greatly worn, even with sateens and ginghams; the lace is usually coarse.

Flounces are put on full in front over gathered flounces of "pinked" silk, and ruches between. They are not cut, but drawn from side to side.

Morning jackets of pale pink or blue foulard, with loose shirt front of lace, and trimming to match, are worn over any skirt for breakfast.

Lace ties are no longer fashionable, but pleatings of lace rising from within the straight high dress and coat collars are very fashionable.

High "masher" linen collars, fastened by a stud in front, are worn by those who affect a manly style.

Cream and white gauze are sometimes tied round the throat in a bow, when a stringless headgear is worn.

Slight figures require the bodice to be pleated or gauged in front, with a belt round the waist.

Fine woolens are this season exceedingly popular for watering-place wear.

Black lace over cherry and gold looks particularly well.

Everything has a buckle or a fancy pin.

Kitchen Cullings.

Lamb broth for an invalid may be made so that it will be very nourishing, and yet be so delicate that it will not distress or nauseate a weak stomach. For a teacupful of broth boil a small slice cut from the hind quarter, with the bone left in, of course; cover this with cold water, and sprinkle a little salt in; let it simmer gently; skim off the scum, and when the lamb has cooked until it is white and the juice is all extracted, strain it, and carry it while hot to your invalid. The first time, and possibly the second, give it with no other seasoning than the salt; the next time you may add a little pepper, or put a spoonful of well-cooked pearl barley in. You can make slight variations in this way, and then go back to the clear broth, if need be. A small quantity of dissolved gelatine can be added to broth like this with good effect. A teaspoonful to a cup of broth would be about the proper proportion.

Since the very latest scientific investigation leads to the decision that gelatine, if given with other food, is highly nutritious, (while alone it is unquestionably lacking in nourishment), the many ways in which it may be used will be of renewed interest. A writer on the chemistry of cooking speaks with unction of gelatine flavored with the unfermented juices of fruit. At this season of the year one may easily try the experiment of using them in place of the lemon or orange juice, or of wine, which is so frequently added to the jelly.

Black currant wine, which is very nice for invalids, and especially for those who suffer from sore throats, is made in this way: To the juice obtained from four pounds of black currants allow seven pounds of sugar, with enough water to make five gallons of liquid; add a quart of peach brandy; let this ferment, and then bottle it. The fermenting process will probably need eight days' time. This is a cooling and very refreshing beverage.

"How much sugar do I need for a quart can of strawberries or of cherries?" is a frequent question just now. The best cooks agree upon these quantities for a quart can of fruit: For strawberries, eight ounces; for cherries, six ounces; for raspberries, four ounces; for plums, eight; for currants, when ripe, eight ounces. These fruits all require good, thorough boiling to prevent fermentation.

Young carrots are an appetizing addition to a dinner of boiled beef. Do not scrape the tender skin from the carrots, but wash them in two or three waters, and after they are cooked rub the skin off with a coarse towel. These, if quite small, may be arranged around the beef on the platter; if not, serve in a vegetable dish, with a little butter, cream and pepper and salt.

A delicious pound cake that is made without using soda is highly recommended: One pound of sugar (either granulated or pulverized), half a pound of butter, eight eggs (the whites and yolks beaten separately), ten ounces of flour; for flavoring, one whole nutmeg, grated. This cake should be baked for an hour and a quarter in a moderately hot oven.

To expedite the making of a lemon pie use hot water in place of cold, stir the cut-up lemon, the sugar, and corn starch or flour, and eggs together, as if you were making pudding sauce; then pour in hot water; if the pail or basin containing this is then placed in a vessel of boiling water it will cook in five minutes.

Stewed cucumber will be a new dish to some cooks; peel and cut in lengthwise strips, either halves or quarters of the cucumbers. Let them boil in water with salt and pepper in it; when tender serve on toast with a little butter. This will sometimes tempt the appetite of a convalescent.

String beans cut in small pieces may be served with roast veal or lamb in place of peas and mushrooms with good effect; in fact, many people who do not like them in any other way find that they give a good relish when cooked with the meat.

Small beets cut in rings form a pretty garnish for salads.

Weather Signals.

Mr. Penrod of New York has invented a code of universal signals for distributing information all over the country of the probable state of the weather, as predicted by the United States signal service. Clear, fair, stormy weather, cold waves, warm waves, frost, rain, floods, thunder storms, tornadoes, cyclones, with all needful variations, and degrees are to be communicated from steam cars, stage coaches, lake and river steamboats, as they pass along, by the number of bell strokes or whistles, by different colored flags, balls, disks and lights or rockets at nights. Cannon and church bells could also be used for the purpose. By this code, should a passing train display the numbers "2 2," it would signify that "a cold wave is approaching." If a designated bell should toll "4 and 3," "light rain" is probable. If a passing steamboat should have up "242," "dangerous floods" would be the translation, or if the steamer used flags, and they would read "white, white, white," "killing frost" is indicated.

NO ROOM.

The river's like glass—
As I slowly pass
This sweet little lass,
Raises two
Forget-me-not eyes
In laughing surprise—
From canoe.

And as I flow by,
Said I, "Miss, O why?
O why may not I
Drift with you?"
Said she, with a start,
"I've no room in my heart—
Or canoe!"

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

During the hot weather there was a striking increase of mortality in all the large cities, especially among the children in houses which were not fit for human habitation.

The telegraphers had the sympathiy of nearly all the newspapers of the United States, and of the people generally, the only exceptions being those whose interests were affected by the partial blockade of the lines.

Australia is talking of a confederation again. The new English-speaking union, the fourth in the history of the race, would have a population of 2,250,000, doubling every few years an export and import trade of $465,000, or a third that of the United States. All in all these colonies are a good deal better able to act for themselves than the thirteen colonies of the United States in 1784, and probably would not hesitate to take immediate action if the attitude of the British government at the present time was the same as that exhibited towards the colonies previous to the revolutionary war.

The able editor is again telling the public what he don't know about cyclones and kindred phenomena. What he does know is known just as well by everybody else, but they are current events and must be treated in some way or other, and so he wrestles with them the best way he can—to fill space in editorial columns. And the great scientists are equally puzzled, as they usually are when there is most need of their learned investigations for the information of the public. The spots on the sun are of little moment. Let them be dropped—since nothing is known about them—and more attention be paid to cyclonic mysteries and manifestations.

The new postal notes which are being prepared at New York and will be ready for delivery about September 1, are shaped like bank notes. Blank spaces are left for the names of the post office issuing the note and of that which is to redeem it. The note contains three columns of figures, one for dollars, from one to four, one for dimes from one to nine and one for cents from one to nine. The officer issuing the note will simply punch out the necessary figures, as for instance: For the sum of $3.65 he will punch out the three in the dollar column, six in the dimes column and five in the cents column. This will prevent any attempt to raise the figures. The charge for the note will be three cents in addition to its face.

The official statistics of emigration from Europe for this year show a considerable decline in its tide since last year. In 1881 the total number of immigrants was 669,431, in 1882 the number was 788,992, and in 1883 it has fallen to 599,114. This is 190,000 less than the year before. After the tremendous inpour in 1882 a reaction in immigration was natural enough from an exhaustion of the sources of supply without seeking any further for the cause. Although the emigration from Germany has declined from 249,000 to 190,000 in a year, the German emigration is almost three times as great as that of the Irish. Next to Germany, England continues to furnish the greatest percentage of emigration, although it too has declined with that of the most of the countries of Europe. Scotland shows a small increase, and the emigration from Italy shows no change.

Since the postal authorities have exhibited so much activity in suppressing the lottery business by denying lottery managers the use of the mails, the papers are urging the postmaster-general to turn his attention to the "bucket-shops," "put, call and straddle" speculators and gamblers in food products by whatever name they are called, who use the mails to a considerable extent to advertise their business and rope in the unwary. Their circulars are scattered over the country, and their fascinating projects have drawn a steady stream of money to Chicago and New York, only to be swallowed up in grain, pork and oil lotteries. There is just as much reason for denying the mails to these people as to the Louisiana lottery. Some of the most disreputable of these concerns have been blacklisted, but there are many more which need attention. Of course, there is danger of carrying the prohibition business too far. The people will not submit to anything like a postal sensorship or espionage. It smacks too strongly of paternalism, and is foreign to all the instincts of a free people. But if laws are to be executed in one case they should be made to cover other evils of greater magnitude.

The report made by the health board of Calcutta, India, gives an alarming report of the spread of cholera in that city. The population of Calcutta is 616,000, and during the first quarter of the present year the epidemic carried off nearly six hundred. The death rate from cholera increased during April and May, the average being four hundred for each month. In no year since 1869 has the mortality from this cause been so great. The death rate proportionately, for this year is greatly in excess of that of 1882. The deaths from cholera in the last mentioned year were 2,240, of which number 1,597 were males and the remainder females. The death rate from cholera, as will be seen, is nearly 1,400 for the first five months of the present year, and the mortality list continues to grow. Experienced observers of the disease entertain great fears that it is destined to each Europe during the season, owing to the constantly growing means of communication especially from Africa and the difficulty of confining it within its natural boundaries. Should it reach Western Europe it is quite likely that America will be greatly exposed to the infection. Were it to visit the United States, it might be the crowning calamity of the year. Of course, a threatened visit of cholera suggests sanitary precautions against a filth-breeding disease. It is a scourge of uncleanliness. But when it once appears, it scourges without much discrimination. It cannot be barred out by treaties, nor altogether by quarantine regulations.

A HORRIBLE EARTHQUAKE.

Casamicciola, Ischia, Lacco, Forio, on the Island of Ischia, Destroyed by an Earthquake—The Former City Entirely Destroyed—3,000 People Known to Have Perished.

Naples, Special Cable, July 29.—The town of Casamicciola, on the island of Ischia, near Naples, was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake last night. The neighboring towns of Forio and Lacciameno were greatly damaged. The shocks began at 9:30 o'clock last night. At that hour a majority of the people of the upper classes were at the theater. Nearly all of the houses in the town collapsed. It is estimated that 800 persons were injured. It is impossible, as yet, to give the exact number of the dead at Casamicciola. In the latest accounts the number is estimated at 3,000; The Hotel Picoola Sentinalla sank in the earth and many of its inmates were buried. Some of the inhabitants of the town escaped to the sea at the first shock. They made their way to Naples with the news of the calamity. The center of the area of the shock was the same as that of two years ago, but the radius was wider. The shock was felt at sea, and according to some accounts even at Naples.

The ground opened in many places, while in other places there was no movement; water gushed out of springs, and several boilers in the bathing houses burst. The theater, which was a wooden structure, was literally torn open, allowing the audience to escape. Steamers loaded with injured people are constantly arriving here from the scene of the calamity. Eight ships are already filled with sufferers. The minister of public works has gone to Casamicciola to organize measures of relief.

The stories told by the survivors are horrible. Many Romans having villas at Ischia are known to have been lost. The dead are fearfully mutilated. In some cases the corpses are plainly discernible through the ruins, but they cannot be extricated. It is surmised that some persons are still alive in the cellars.

A correspondent telegraphs the 29th that, judging from reports already at hand, the calamity will infinitely exceed the Chiose earthquake in 1881.

The bishop of Casamicciola, Don Filipani of Rome, and the prefect of Cagiaria, are reported, to be among the dead. There were very few English visitors on the island at the time of the disaster. None of the special dispatches mention American names among the killed or wounded.

The Naples correspondent of the Cersalfere telegraphs as follows: "I have just returned from Ischia. Casamicciola, Saocco and Forio have been destroyed. They were three of the most flourishing communities on the Island, which was half overthrown. The road between the towns of Ischia and Casamicciola is impassable. The perfect of Naples telegraphs that the town of Casamicciola has ceased to exist. The train from this city to Naples to-day was crowded with passengers going to inquire as to the fate of their friends. None of the special dispatches mentioned American names among the killed or injured.

Ischia is a volcanic island situated at the north entrance of the Bay of Naples. The circumference is about nineteen miles, and the superficial area about twenty-six square miles. Monte Epomeo, or San Niclo, the ancient Epomeus, or Epopeus, is the highest point, rising 2,600 feet above the sea level. The principal summit is surrounded by twelve inferior volcanic cones, from one of which the last eruption took place in 1302.

Casamicciola is located at the foot of Mount Eponilo, near Naples, and had a population of about 5,000. It was famed throughout Italy for its thermal springs and baths. Forio is a seaport town on the western coast of Ischia, with a population of about 6,000, and has mineral baths which are much resorted to.

The earthquake at Casamiccola in 1881 was upon Friday, March 4, of that year. There were two shocks, the first occurring at 1:30 p. m. and the second an hour later. The whole upper part of the town was destroyed, and two thermal establishments destroyed. The second, which was the fatal shock, and was accompanied by a noise like subterranean thunder. Then came the crash of falling houses, accompanied by the shrieks of the victims. The soldiers from Naples city rescued many from the ruins. The population fled to the surrounding country and along the sea coast. The loss of life was about 200.

IRISH VENGEANCE.

James Carey, the Informer, Shot on Shipboard Near Port Elizabeth, Cape Colony—He Dies on Reaching Shore, and O'Donnell Is the Name of the Avenger.

A London dispatch of July 30th says: Intelligence has just been received here that James Carey, the informer in the Phœnix Park murder cases, was shot dead on the 30th at Port Elizabeth, while landing from the steamship Melrose, from Capetown. The deed was committed by a fellow-passenger named O'Donnell. O'Donnell took passage here by the steamship Kinfaurs Castle, which left Dublin on the 6th for Capetown, where she transferred her passengers, who were destined to Port Elizabeth, Natal and other coast ports, to the steamship Melrose. He is in custody. The report of the shooting of Carey caused intense excitement in the West End, London, and in the house of commons, The government had taken special and expensive measures to protect Carey.

It appears that O'Donnel dogged Carey from London. Both sailed in the steamer King Faun's Castle. The Daily Telegraph says the government has little doubt that Carey was followed from Dublin. They believe that the Fenians had taken most elaborate measures to prevent his escape. According to the latest accounts, the murder occurred at sea. Carey was not killed outright, but died shortly after he was shot. O'Donnell surrendered himself quietly. He was placed in a cell and handed over to the police when the Melrose arrived at Port Elizabeth.

Carey was traveling under the name of Power. His family were with him. He embarked at Darmouth. From Maderia he wrote a letter to the authorities, in which he described the voyage and said he had shared in conversation in which Invincibles and the miscreant Carey were especially denounced. He said he intended to forget that Ireland ever existed.

The news of James Carey's death caused many exhibitions of delight on streets in Dublin. A large crowd gathered in front of, James Carey's late residence, cheering loudly because the informer had been killed. The Dublin authorities believe that O'Donnel is a man who was implicated three years ago in an attempt to blow up the Manston house, London, and who escaped with Coleman to New York. The government selected Africa as the safest place for Carey. It is doubtful whether he knew his destination before sailing.

James Carty was a member of the municipal council at Dublin, and was among the score or more of individuals arrested in that city on the 13th of January last on suspicion of having taken part in the assassination of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Under Secretary Burke on May 6, 1882. On the 17th of the month following his arrest Carey astonished the world and incensed the Irish element by turning informer and "giving away his pals." From the moment that Carey, to save his own neck, betrayed his associates in the tragedy, in the preparation for and enactment of which he himself bore a conspicuous part, he was a doomed man. On the conclusion of the trial he was kept in jail, being allowed an occasional mouthful of air outside the prison walls under police escort. But unless constantly under police protection, Dublin was too hot for him; indeed, the whole world was not large enough to hold the man who, however justly, had sent four of his brethern in crime to the gallows.

Death of the Famous King Cetewayo.

News has been received from Africa that King Cetewayo has been killed, but no particulars have come to hand.

The war waged by the British against the savages led by Cetewayo, in Zululand, in 1880, was one of the most interesting series of events that engaged the world's attention that year. Perhaps the saddest and certainly the most romantic episode connected with the struggle, was the killing of the young prince imperial of France who had offered his services to the English. After the capture of Cetewayo, Zululand was apportioned among thirteen chiefs. Three of them, John Dunn, Hamu, or Oham, the king's brother, and Zibebu, proved cruel tyrants and robbers who pillaged and killed the other tribes. The rest of the Zulus pined for their captive monarch, to whom they were greatly attached. The British government finally concluded that the restoration of Cetewayo would be the best guarantee of order and place, but the Natal settlers protested clamorously. Previous to his restoration the savage monarch was taken to London, Eng., to witness the majesty and power of the British nation. He passed the month of August, 1882, in London, and was then conveyed back to Cape Colony and as soon as the difficulties were arranged, was reinstated in his kingdom. Since then he has been at war with neighboring tribes, an amusement that has at last cost him his life.

The Minnesota State Fair Buildings

The state fair buildings erected at Owatonna, Minn., by the citizens of that place at an expense of $3,000 or $4,000 were included in the property wrecked by the fearful storm of last Saturday. With commendable enterprise the officers of the county propose to commence rebuilding at once, but as the citizens of Owatonna had already been to large expense, and as many of them had individually suffered loss by the storm, it was decided to ask aid of the business men in St. Paul. To prosecute the work of obtaining subscriptions, Col. Clark W. Thomson, president, and R. C. Judson, secretary, and Hon. Mark H. Dunnell came to St. Paul and returned home, having obtained subscriptions amounting to more than $1,300, The list was headed by the name of J. J. Hill, who contributes the generous sum of $500; N. W. Kittson, D. M. Sabin and A. H. Wilder subscribed $100 each, and Albert Scheffer, W. R. Merriam, N. P. Clark, Gen. Hubbard and C. D. Gilfillan $50 each. The other subscriptions were in sums of $10 and $25.

Immoral Widow Pensioners.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, July 26.—The statement was made not long ago that a clerk in the pension office had said there were as many as 10,000 cases where soldiers' widows were leading immoral lives in order to retain their pensions, of which in the event of their actual marriage they would be deprived. Gen. Dudley, the commissioner of pensions, says the statement is false and declares that no clerk in the pension office has any such information, for no such information is known to exist. Instead of 10,000, there are not 100 of such cases known. The act of congress passed August, 1882, providing that open and notorious adulterous cohabitation of a widow who is a pensioner shall terminate the pension the same as if actually married, is being strictly enforced. The commissioner further says that the percentage of fraud in procuring pensions is not 1-10 of 1 per cent. The closest scrutiny and investigation into the merits of all claims are made by officers of the department.

A rumor reached Grand Forks, Dak., that George Irkster, a farmer living about fifty miles southwest of Grand Forks, was shot and killed between Mouse and Forrest river. Irkster had a large drove of cattle in that country, and cowboys passing through riddled his body with bullets. Irkster was born in Manitoba, and had been in the vicinity of Grand Forks for sixteen years.

W. J. Newton, agent at Grand Forks for the grain firm of Sterrett, Hill & Childs, of St. Paul, suicided at Grand Forks on the 29th inst., by taking strychnine. He was found dead in bed the next morning. Newton led a fast life with women, but did not drink. Mr. Newton was about sixty years old and leaves a wife and several children. He formerly lived in Lake City, where he was a member of the firm of Goldsmith & Newton.

A strange fatality seems to hang over Sanborn, Dak. Within four weeks, no less than five of her citizens have met with violent deaths. June the 23, Joseph Conroy was killed by a runaway team; the same day Haus Byhre was killed by the cars; July 14, Olaf Moe died of the injuries caused by a runaway; July the 53, Rev. E. B. Prindle and Hiram Colville were killed by lightning.

Lincoln, Nebr., Special:—At six o'clock Sunday morning the wholesale drug house of Lighton & Brown was discovered to be on fire. The flames spread rapidly through the buildings and to adjoining ones, until nearly $200,000 worth of property was destroyed. The chemicals ignited rapidly, and dense smoke arose from that portion of that building where the oils were stored. The wholesale and retail building, a hardware store, three stories, and five or six wooden buildings were destroyed before the fire was gotten under control. Leighton & Brown's loss on drugs, wholesale and retail store will reach $130,000. A. M. Davis' loss on building is $4,000. There were a great many other losses of less amount, some of them covered by insurance.

Mankato has a scandal, involving Dr. Christiansen and wife and a servant girl of eighteen years. The doctor is said to be criminally intimate with the girl, whom he kept in his house. His residence was mobbed and the girl compelled to leave.

In the Ramsey county district court a bill has been filed for separation and alimony by Mrs. Carrie Peyer against her husband, Emil Peyer, a prominent merchant of St. Paul. The complainant sets forth that defendant is thirty-three years of age while plaintiff has seen but twenty-seven summers. They have been married several years and the union has been crowned with two children. As a ground for the complaint the plaintiff alleges cruel treatment it being a common pastime of the defendant to fly into a passion and accuse the plaintiff of having committed adultery, while as a diversion it is alleged that he would place a cocked revolver at her head and threaten to blow her brains out.

Mankato is elated over the immense works now being erected by the Standard Cement company of 14 Wall street, New York. This company has purchased something over 150 acres of land on the north bank of the Blue Earth river, and adjoining the St. Paul Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad. This land contains immense deposits of stone suitable for making the very best hydraulic cement. The ledge of lower magnesian limestone creeps out on the banks of the Blue Earth, and it is estimated to be on an average twenty-four feet thick and underlies the country back of the river for a mile or more. It is estimated by Mr. Cummings, superintendent of the works, that it will yield 400,000 barrels per acre of cement.
